Man Still Gropes Vainly for Truth

I told a philosopher once that all the other philosophers would have to go out of business if one of them should happen to discover the truth.

It is true that we have acquired a great deal of material knowledge in recent years, but so far as knowledge of the truth itself is concerned, I cannot see that we are any nearer to it now than our less imaginative ancestors were when they cracked each other's skulls with stone hatchets.

It is easy, and just now rather fashionable, to say that there is no soul, but we do not know whether there is a soul or not. If a man is a materialist, or mechanist, or whatever he likes to call himself, I can see for him no escape from belief in a futility so prolonged and complicated and diabolical and preposterous as to be worse than absurd; and as I do not know that such a tragic absurdity is not a fact, I can only know my native inability to believe that it is one.

There is nothing in the thought of annihilation that frightens me; for it would be, at the worst, nothing more terrible than going to sleep at the end of a long day, whether a pleasant or a painful one, or both.

But if life is only what it appears to be, no amount of improvement or enlightenment will ever compensate or atone for what it has inflicted and endured in ages past, or for what it is inflicting and enduring today.—Edwin Arlington Robinson in Red Book.

Ancient Bean Sprouted

A large white bean picked up in the ruins of Grand Quivira and believed to be 300 years old, has sprouted into a living stalk at a museum in San Antonio, Texas. The bean was found in an excavation 70 feet from the surface at ruins near Santa Fe. The bean was soaked in water for five hours and less than two weeks later a stalk six inches tall had grown from the seed.

Americans, speaking generally, scorn authority. It is in the atmosphere. Does that explain our crime?

Teddy Bear Sanctuary

Koalas, known colloquially as "native bears," real live teddy bears in soft, plush-like fur, have lately become the object of special solicitude, both official and private, in Australia. For several generations nobody paid any attention to them, for they were so numerous that it never occurred to Australians that they could ever become scarce. But a highly fatal epidemic got started among them some years ago, killing them by thousands. Shooting koalas is now forbidden. Even more promising is the setting aside of well-supervised sanctuary areas, where not only these attractive marsupials but also other interesting but threatened native animals and plants have a chance for their lives.

Farm Waste Worth Fortune

Raw material enough to make several times the quantity of paper, fiber board, acetic acid, alcohols, acetone and charcoal required by the country is represented in the annual waste of 260,000,000 tons of grain straw and stalks.

Racers Paced by Robot

Like the mechanical rabbit that leads the whippets in a dog race, a robot athlete is used to set the pace for the track men at Oxford university, England. The figure of a runner, mounted on a mechanically operated rubber-tired wheel, moves around the outside of the track at different speeds. By keeping abreast of the speeding robot, the varsity men learn to judge the pace at which they are running. The innovation is said to be of special value in training distance runners, whose success largely depends upon their ability to pace themselves so that they can reserve sufficient strength to carry them through the final sprint.

Music Shorthand Is Latest

A system of music shorthand with which anyone possessing a musical ear, but no musical training, can take down unfamiliar melodies while sung or played, has been devised by a man at Chester-le-Street, England. He claims that anyone may use the system after a few lessons.

"Now, what were dresses like ten years ago?" mused the artist.

"Like mine, dear," replied his wife.

What kind of food builds a

100% BABY?

READ WHAT 50 BABIES TAUGHT TWO SCIENTISTS

OF COURSE, you want your baby to be a rosy, healthy baby . . . taking his food contentedly . . . putting on his ounces regularly.

Yet you're hoping even more, perhaps, that he's building now for future health. Building hard bones, good teeth, strong muscles, sound nerves—to make him fit and fine in the years to come.

When mother's milk fails, can any other food build such a baby? . . . Read of a recent scientific test.

World-famous clinic makes feeding test

Recently, two baby specialists made a test with 50 average infants. Into these babies' bottles—month after month—went a food famous for 75 years as a baby builder. Millions of healthy citizens are living testimonials of its benefits. Yet never before had such a thorough, modern test of this food been made.

This food was . . . Eagle Brand Milk. Throughout the test, it was the only milk these babies received. The usual supplementary foods* were used.

And how those babies were studied! X-ray pictures of bones were taken. Tooth formation was watched. Blood counts were made. Weights and heights were charted. And at last came the report.

By every known test, these babies showed themselves splendidly nourished. This simple diet—Eagle Brand, with the usual supplementary foods—had proved itself equal to the building of a 100% baby.*

If you cannot nurse your baby, try Eagle Brand. Next to mother's milk, it is the easiest form of milk in the world to digest. Mail coupon for new free booklet on all phases of baby care.

*The usual supplementary foods (used with any milk diet) are orange or tomato juice, and cod-liver oil or other source of the anti-rachitic vitamin D.

Points scientists look for in judging a baby

★ Firm flesh.

THE ST. LAWRENCE TREATY

President Hoover points with pride to the signing of the St. Lawrence Treaty with Canada as a fulfillment of a campaign promise made in the 1928 campaign. Ignoring a letter from Franklin D. Roosevelt sent several months ago and declining with thanks Roosevelt's recent offer of assistance Hoover was determined that nobody except Herbert Hoover should have credit for this important agreement.

Americans and Canadians alike should applaud the settlement of the St. Lawrence affair. It insures a Great Lakes to Atlantic waterway for ninety per cent of world shipping to be completed within ten years. From an American standpoint it should be a boon to the Western farmers and manufacturers and in addition it will supply tremendous hydro-electric power.

This latter item is the one in which the State of New York is primarily interested for, under the plan, New York would supply a large part of the money and have the privilege of dispensing the power generated. The fact that New York will be called upon to pay from one-fifth to one-sixth of the cost certainly gives that State a right to be represented in the proceedings and the New York Governor is just as certainly the man to negotiate for his State.

Mr. Roosevelt may have had his eye on the political barometer when he offered a helping hand but undoubtedly he was justified in his offer. However, the matter is settled now with nothing remaining save ratification by the Canadian Parlament and the American Senate, which is not always a formality. It is a Hoover treaty designed to promote Hoover popularity and garner Hoover votes. It is interesting to note that it took a presidential campaign to arouse the President' interest in the matter. Had President Hoover worked as hard in a constructive way for three and a half years instead of trying to do everything in the last six months of his administration he would have earned for himself a reputation as a constructive statesman. As it is there is a strong odor of politic in all of the President's recent activites.

HYDE ON REFORESTRATION

Although President Hoover is still officially unaware that he is the Republican standard-bearer for 1932, the "Three Musketeers" of the Cabinet, Secretaries Brown, Mills, and Hyde are certainly under no delusions in that respect. They are taking the stump vigorously and blatantly for the President.

In Roosevelt's acceptance speech, the Democratic nominee outlined a policy of reforestation which he stated would have the two-fold purpose of saving the American forests and providing employment for the unemployed. Mr. Roosevelt stated that a nationwide policy of this kind would employ something like a million men for at least some weeks.

Recently Secretary of Agriculture Hyde has undertaken to answer Mr. Roosevelt to ridicule his suggestions. Among other surprising statements made by Musketeer Hyde was the statement that one million men could be able to plant one billion trees in one day and that not more than two hundred million seedlings are available in the nurseries of America.

For a Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde shows astonishing ignorance. He seems to have the idea that all reforestation amounts to is the purchase of seedling trees from nurseries, digging of holes, and placing of said trees in said holes.

Mr. Hyde entirely ignores the fact that reforestration is a continuing, complicated problem which would not be settled by planting trees and forgetting about them. Irrigation and fertilization seem to mean nothing to "Dirt Farmer" Hyde. Protection, forest fires, and drainage are mere words to the Secretary of Agriculture.

If this is a representative Republican campaign speech, the Republican campaign is off to a bad start. Mr. Roosevelt should be congratulated for his stand on reforestration. It is one of the crying needs of America and in endorsing it he is following in the footsteps of his great cousin, the late Theodore Roosevelt. Attacks like that of Mr. Hyde should produce about as much results as the pouring of the proverbial water on the proverbial duck's back.

SHRADERS CELEBRATE GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY WEDDING AT SHELBY

Lovely Country Home Scene Of Beautiful Affair; Only Love Songs Used is Musical Program

Of much interest here and thruout the State was the celebration of the Golden Wedding Anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Shrader at their lovely country home near Shelby, Alabama.

In the receiving line were Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Shrader, their eight children, and twelve grand-children, who welcomed a host of their friends from Shelby County and from Birmingham.

The punch bowl was presided over by Misses Beth and Leona Davis and Miss Marjorie McDaniel.

At a beautifully appointed table sat Mrs. Steadman Wood with the guest book in which were registered the names and good wishes from the guests to this popular couple.

A beautiful musical program was arranged by Mrs. Joe Brown, from Birmingham, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Hendricks of Shelby, Alabama and J. L. Martin of Birmingham. Only the old love songs were used in this presentation such as: "When You And I Were Young Maggie", "In The Gloaming", and "Love's Old Sweet Song" were beautifully sung by Mrs. Joe Brown.

Just as the last rays from the setting sun flickered through the southern smilax casting its happy shadows over the large group of friends, Rev. T. K. Roberts took his place before an improvised altar of old fashioned flowers, and the strains of Mendelsohn's Wedding March played by Mrs. Brown ushered in the "Youthful Lovers" who again plighted their troth, using the ring ceremony.

The bride was exquisitely gowned in a lavendar chiffron and carried a shower bouquet of lavender asters and lilies of the valley. The happy couple received congratulations, golden gifts and all good wishes from their friends. This popular couple typifying the little poem:

"Two volumes bound in one complete,
A thrilling story, old but sweet—
No title needs the cover fair—
Two golden hearts are blended there."

The guests from Columbiana enjoying this gala occasion were: Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovits, Mr. and Mrs. Elner McGibboney, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Christian, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Merrell, Mr. and Mrs. Steadman Wood, Rev. and Mrs. T. K. Roberts.

SWEET POTATO PLANTS BEING SOLD IN STATE MUST HAVE INSPECTION

Inspection For Protection Of Buyers Free To Any Farmer Applying To State Department

According to the State Department of Agriculture all sweet potato plants that are sold in Alabama must be inspected and certified by a representative of the department. There must be three inspections, one in the field while the potatoes are growing, one while the potatoes are in storage, and one in the Spring while they are on the bed.

The purpose of the inspections are to protect the buyers so that they will not get diseased potato plants.

This inspection is free to any farmer in Alabama, applying to the State Department of Agriculture before July 16, each year. All farmers expecting to sell potato plants next year should apply to the State Department of Agriculture immediately for inspection and get qualified under the law to sell certified plants.

400 FARMERS ARE ON LIVE-AT-HOME BASIS

Method of Farming Will Improve Banking, Mercantile and Professional Business

"Living at home and boarding at the same place" is being practiced successfully by 400 Fayette County farmers, according to J. C. Ford, county agent, who says that many more will be doing the same thing by next fall and still more by next spring.

These farmers are making their farms as near self-sustaining as feasible. They are receiving cash for sale of milk, cream, butter, poultry and eggs. Their income from these sources is sufficient to meet their cash requirements, thereby keeping their expenditures within their actual income.

Farming this way has been advocated by Mr. Ford for many years. He is enthusiastic over the fact that 400 farm families are on the self-sustaining basis. Most of them are producing cotton and their income from it next fall will not have to go to pay debts incurred this year. It will be a surplus which they will use for other purposes.

Cooperation of bankers and business men is being given in the live-at-

SOUTHERN FREIGHT DEPOT AT TALLEDEGA DESTROYED BY FIRE

Fire Believed To Have Been Started By Children Seen Playing On Cotton Bales

The Southern railroad freight depot of Talladega was in ruins Thursday as the result of a fire of undetermined origin late Wednesday.

Damage has not been officially estimated but it is believed to be more than $15,000. The building and frame sheds, a block long, were destroyed. Forty-four bales of cotton, other freight and office records were destroyed or damaged.

Investigators expressed the belief the fire was possibly started by children who were seen playing on the cotton shortly before the blaze was discovered.

DAIRY REMINDERS FOR INTERESTED DAIRYMEN

Pastures should be clipped in July with a mower to keep down such pests as bitter weed, thistle, cypress weed, and dock.

A home-made fly spray may be made by soaking one pound of unground pyrethrum flowers in two gallons of kerosene for 48 hours. Then carefully strain and add one quart of fuel oil. Cows should be kept out of the hot sun an hour after they have been sprayed.

A satisfactory fly poison may be made by putting one tablespoonful of formalin in one cup of sweet milk. Put in containers similar to soup plates. This mixture is poison and should be kept from children and livestock.

Check up on the freshening dates for cows. They should have at least six weeks dry period with an abundance of good feet. Cheaper milk production will be the reward.

There is at least one carload of scrub bulls in every county in Alabama that should be loaded on a car and sent to the butcher this month. Scrub bulls cannot sire high producing offspring.

In 1930 there was shipped into Alabama 3,797,247 pounds of butter to supply the 13 principal cities. Insist on your local market being supplied with Alabama butter. Then help your local creamery to hold this market by supplying only quality cream.

Cows which produce less than 200 pounds of butterfat per year cannot pay for their feed under present conditions. These cows should be bred to beef bulls and allowed to raise calves instead of being kept in the dairy herd.

HUGH MALLORY GIVES VIEWS ON PROBLEMS OF STATE EDUCATION

Grammar And High Schools Should Be Given Consideration In Fund Application

CUT EXPENSES TO MEET THE REVENUE OF STATE

Consideration For Teachers, Who Have Rendered Valiant Aid, Urged By Selmian

Hugh Mallory, who called upon Governor Miller some weeks ago in a letter which received wide publicity and approbation, to balance the State's budget to fit the size of her income, has been requested by members of the Legislature to state his views on a way out of the financial difficulties which confront the state, and has complied with some pertinent suggestions which are sure to receive thoughtful consideration.

Mr. Mallory prefaces his suggestions with the statement that he is deeply interested in Alabama's school teachers who have rendered valiant service during the past year, and he urges that some way be worked out for their relief. Good teachers are more important than school houses or the continuance of standards the State cannot afford, he points out.

Economy Vital

"Moreover," he continues, "it is imperative that the State live within its means. We are now face to face with the tragic example of the folly of any other course. Everybody knows that we cannot continue our schools, roads or any other State activities along the ambitious lines upon which they have been conducted during the past decade. Each of them must submit to drastic cuts. Departmental expenses and personnel should be cut to the bone. Overlapping work should be eliminated and consolidations, both of departments and work, should be affected wherever possible."

Mr. Mallory believes that in the application of school funds prime consideration should be given to our grammar and high schools and he reaffirms his former statement that the Legislature should make a conservative estimate of the expected revenue of the State to be derived from reasonable taxation, and then allow a given amount to each department, compelling the department to live within the same.

Many Debts Illegal?

Mr. Mallory believes that many of the debts incurred by the State, which now owes between fifteen and twenty million dollars, have been in-

CALLAHAN, FAMOUS AUTHOR, GIVES GOOD ADVICE ABOUT WORRY

Famous Author Of 'Smiles', Written During War, Wonders Why People Worry

By Mildred W. Wallace

Here is an anonymous paragraph that comes to us from J. Will Callahan, famous author of the Smiles song so popular during the the World War, from his summer home in Bay View, Mich.

"I wonder why folks worry. There are only two reasons for worry. Either you are successful or you are not successful. If you are successful there is nothing to worry about; if you are not successful there are only two things to worry about. Your health is either good or you are sick; if your health is good there is nothing to worry about; if you are sick there are only two things to worry about. You are going to get well or you are going to die; if you are going to get well there is nothing to worry about; if you are going to die there are only two things to worry about. You are either going to heaven or you are not going to heaven; if you are going to heaven there is nothing to worry about; if you are going to the other place you will be so damned busy shaking hands with old friends you won't have time to worry—so—Why Worry?"

FARM NEWS BRIEFS FOR PEOPLE OF THIS COUNTY

Secretary of the Treasury Mills recently announced the deficit of the U. S. Treasury the largest in this country's peace-time history. Receipts for the year ended Thursday (June 30) reached $2,121,000,000, he said, while expenditures mounted to $5,006,000,000.

A London dispatch (July 1) states that Great Britain made ready yesterday to raise a special $11,000,000 annual tariff barrier against the Irish Free State in retaliation for that dominion's failure to buy land annuities.

ALABAMA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION WILL BE HELD AT AUBURN SOON

Program Will Include Visits To The Agricultural Experiment Field Station

The Annual meeting of the Alabama Farm Bureau Federation will be held at Auburn, Alabama, August 2, 3, and 4, it has been announced by J. L. Edwards, president.

On the same date in Auburn the annual Farmer's Week exercises, and in addition the annual convention of the Alabama Council of Home Demon stration Clubs will be held.

A general program of instruction and recreation is being arranged by the Auburn Extension Service staff and in addition special programs are being arranged by President Edwards of the Farm Bureau and Mrs. J. D. Giles, president of the Council of Home Demonstration Clubs.

Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, will be the principal speaker on the Farm Bureau program. Another speaker will be Miss Mary Mims, extension sociologist of Louisiana State University, said to be one of the finest speakers to farm audiences in America and whose success in rural community organization in Louisiana has been remarkable.

The program will include visits to the agricultural experiment station fields where important agricultural questions will be studied.

COUNTY AND STATE SCHOOL SITUATION DISCUSSED SATURDAY

Mr. J. A. Keller and Dr. J. B. Hobdy Give Views Of Deplorable Conditions

Representatives from a number of schools in Shelby County and interested patrons heard Mr. J. A. Kellar, President of the Alabama Education Association, and Dr. J. B. Hobdy, State Director of Vocational Agriculture, speak in the Court House on Saturday afternoon on the school situation in the State.

The deplorable condition of our school mantenance funds was discussed. Dr. Hobdy stated that the primary cause for the failure of the State in meeting the expenses of the schools was that the appropriation made by the Legislature in 1927 for Education had not been used for this purpose.

Resolutions from various Counties in the State have been passed protesting the discrimination against schools as shown by the fact that other State agencies and departments had taken a prior claim on the State Treasury over the public schools of the State, other State employees being paid salaries while teachers remained unpaid. Copies of these resolutions have been mailed to Governor Miller and to the State Legislature asking that they take definite and immediate action to place the schools on a sound financial basis, so that schools could open next year.

The speakers further stated that teachers, school boards and truck drivers had done their part as they had accepted from 15 to 25 per cent cuts in their salaries.

The school situation in Shelby County is in a critical condition and Dr. Hobdy and Mr. Kellar were greeted by a large and interested audience.

SUMMER CARE OF BUYING AND KEEPING FOOD BIG PROBLEM

A Good Refrigerator Helps To Solve Many Different Kinds Of Spoilage

What may be economy in the buying of food, often depends on the means and space for keeping food, and also the care in handling it, after it is bought. Miss Helen Kennedy, extension nutritionist, Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn advises that care in handling, a knowledge of the dangers of food poisoning, and precautions against contamination of food are necessary to protect the family's health and pocketbook. A good refrigerator solves many food keeping problems; and a home without one has its troubles.

The housekeeper must guard against different kinds of spoilage. Some foods change texture. Some lose flavor, others become actually harmful. Green vegetables wilt bebecause their moisture evaporates. Crackers and cookies, on the other hand, take up moisture from the air and thereby lose their crispness. Light affects some kinds of food. It hastens the ripening of fresh vegetables, and it is bad for fats and oils which become rancid under light and warm conditions.

Miss Kennedy advises careful washing of fruits and vegetables that are to be eaten raw a good precaution against organisms. Cold air of the refrigerator checks the ripening of berries, tomatoes, peaches and other fruits, thereby preventing early spoilage. Lettuce and all other salad vegetables should be placed in moist wrapping or in a covered ventilated dish or pan.

CANADA PAYS TRIBUTE TO GEN. WASHINGTON

Neighbors Honor Memory of Our First President.

Washington.—From British Columbia on the Pacific to Newfoundland on the Atlantic, Canada is actively participating in the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth, according to official reports received by the United States George Washington Bicentennial commission. Throughout the length and breadth of the land fitting exercises have been held in sincere tribute to the memory of the first President of the United States.

In Toronto the American Women's club, with the co-operation of the Toronto post of the American Legion and the office of the United States consul general, held a Colonial dinner and ball in the Royal York hotel. Dr. George W. Locke, chief librarian of the Toronto public libraries, delivered an address on Washington. Doctor Locke was introduced by Emil Sauer, United States consul general at Ontario. The event attracted wide attention in the Toronto press.

Bear No Grudge.

A service conducted by Rev. H. R. Grant in Saint Andrews church at Fort William was dedicated to George Washington. The editorial column of the Times Journal of that city noted the occasion with approval and said, "Present-day Americans bear no more grudge against George III of England than Englishmen bear against George Washington."

Under the auspices of the American Women's club of Vancouver a birthday luncheon was held in the Hotel Vancouver.

Interesting in its spontaneity is the project planned by the Memorial University college in St. John's, Newfoundland. A request from the college for material and information on George Washington has been forwarded to the United States George Washington Bicentennial commission with the explanation that students at the institution wish to prepare essays on the life and career of the first President of the United States. The college also plans to present a drama written around the life of George Washington.

One of the most pretentious of all the Canadian programs in connection with the bicentennial celebration was carried out in Kingston where an entertainment held in the Hotel La Salle under the auspices of the American Women's club opened the observance. Many prominent officials and citizens of Kingston attended the reception and it was reported an outstanding success.

Lasting Friendship.

The speakers referred to the cordial relations between Canada and the United States and expressed the belief that such occasions as the George Washington bicentennial celebration could result only in a better understanding between these two English-speaking countries of North America.

The Kingston Whig-Standard paid high tribute to George Washington. The article concluded in the following words: "Old antagonisms have been forgotten. Canada and the United States have existed side by side for a century without forts or warships and this Washington bicentenary observance will further cement the friendship that has existed for years between the two countries."

Receptions and programs in honor of George Washington have also been held in Montreal, Winnipeg, Sault Ste. Marie, and other places. Service clubs throughout the Dominion have observed the bicentennial celebration in various ways, and radio talks have eulogized George Washington.

WAR CHILDREN SEEK LOST KIN IN FRANCE

Thousands, Ignorant of Their Names, Ask for Help.

Paris.—Thousands of war children separated from parents, brothers and sisters during the world conflict are still seeking members of their families 14 years after the armistice. Their ages range from fourteen to nineteen years. Most of them were too young to remember their names or where they lived when forced out of their homes by raids or bombardments.

Several times a year the Society of Wards of the Nation at Saint Quentin publishes lists of the children in its care.

Lancelin Denise, for instance, born at Cambrai and now twenty years old, can remember that his mother was taken to a hospital just before the Germans entered his home town. He has not seen or heard of her since.

Georges Hammer, who lived at Deseseville Somain and whose brother died in the war, is seeking his sister, Eva. Georges Wallebrand, now seventeen, was brought up by the Germans as a civil prisoner. He has no idea where his parents are, for he was taken from them when he was three years old.

Marcelhale and his sister Madeleine were picked up as orphans by officials at Laon. They proved they had been in various parts of France searching for their parents, whom they had not seen since the outbreak of the war.

Eugene Henri Cagny, from Chauny, will receive an inheritance if he can be found. Official records show that his father was killed at Verdun in 1916.

There are thousands of similar cases. Twenty parents have been found by their children in recent months, but the percentage of reunions 14 years after the war is pathetically small.

Oldest Mother

Nah-thle-tle, one-hundred-and-nine-year-old Apache Indian woman of Apache, Okla., who was hailed as "the oldest mother in the United States" by the General Federation of Women's Clubs in session in Seattle. The federation found seven other mothers all more than one hundred years old. Nah-thle-tle, who is blind and nearly deaf, is the mother of two children; a son, Jason, who lives in Oklahoma, and a daughter who is dead. She is a first cousin of Geronimo, famous Apache chieftain.

HOUSEHOLD NOTES

Use kerosene to clean white enamel or porcelain bathtubs and bowls.

To save polishing forks and spoons wash them in hot soapy water immediately after use. Dry them with a soft cloth.

To remove grass stains try rubbing lard or butter on the spot and let stand a few hours, then wash in the usual way. If stain does not disappear, repeat.

To keep brass plates and handles untarnished rub a new potato over them after they have been cleaned. This will keep them bright for several days.

When washing greasy dishes add a few drops of ammonia to the water. The work will be more quickly and thoroughly done.

When cleaning your refrigerator use one teaspoonful of sal soda to four quarts of cold water. This will keep the drain pipe clean and free.

POTPOURRI

Boiling Water

The boiling point of a liquid depends upon the atmospheric pressure of the immediate locality, and is therefore not uniform. At sea level the boiling point for water is 212 degrees F. The atmospheric pressure diminishes the boiling point 1 degree F. with every 550 feet altitude. Thus on Mount Blanc, 16,000 feet above sea level, the boiling point is 185 degrees F.

Tavern School Teaches Dumb Man to Read Lips

Ide, Devonshire, England.—For 24 years Walt Luke was deaf and dumb. Every night he visited the public house drinking cider with his fellow villagers, saying nothing. This became too much for them, so they decided to teach Luke to talk.

Amid smoke and tankards of cider they made syllables with their mouths and passed words written on pieces of paper to him. Watching and studying their lip talk, Luke used to repeat the signs after them. Their endeavors, although tedious, proved successful. Walt Luke could speak. The very first words he said were: "Pint, please," and the next, "Half pint." Lip talk continued and Luke has become very efficient.

Sets High Standard for Pig Marketing

Record of Illinois Farmer Cited as Example.

Whereas few farmers raise more than 70 per cent of the pigs farrowed, Charles B. Shuman, a graduate of the college of agriculture, University of Illinois, has hung a record during the past three years of raising and selling 84 per cent of the pigs farrowed on his Moultrie county farm.

His rate of marketing has run so high that during the three years his sales have averaged almost eight pigs a litter. Out of 568 pigs farrowed in 62 litters, he has sold 475. He is cooperating with the extension service of the college in demonstrating swine sanitation and other approved practices.

Last summer Shuman fed 52 head and sold them September 23, when they were six and a half months of age, averaging 204 pounds each. They paid well for their feed. They were fed corn, wheat, oats, tankage and soy bean oil meal. They used 391 pounds of feed for each 100 pounds' gain, according to the report which Shuman made on them to E. T. Robbins, live stock extension specialist of the college.

How to Make Effective War on the Groundhog

Groundhogs cause damage both by eating the crop and by the piles of stones and gravel which spoil the mower blades.

Readers are asking how this pest may be destroyed. Guns and traps are most in use. Carbide gas may be used, but is not effective unless all the holes are well sealed. One of the cheapest and easiest methods, if one has a car, is to use carbon monoxide gas. This gas, which is very dangerous, is made in the motor and is released through the exhaust pipe.

First block all the holes so that they are as airtight as possible and prevent the animals from escaping. Drive the car up to the main hole, and in this place the end of a rubber tube, the other end of which is attached to the exhaust of the motor. Leave the motor running for about twenty minutes, which should supply enough to kill the pests. Readers who have had experiences in this or other methods of eradication are invited to report on results.—Montreal Family Herald.

Hot-Weather Pests

Warm weather arouses the reproductive instinct of flies. By midsummer it would seem as if nature has overdone the job of guaranteeing the perpetuation of the species. Certainly it doesn't take so many to be assured of breeding stock from year to year, considering their prolific tendencies.

Warm weather also arouses the activity of harmful bacteria. We are thinking now of those that cause milk to sour, making it unfit for food. Careless handling of milk in warm weather is just as certain to invite trouble as the certainty that sunset will follow sunrise. Clean cows, clean milking, clean utensils, and prompt cooling prevent these bacteria from doing their dirty work.

But flies? How shall we keep their filthy feet from contaminating our food and from torturing our cows? Make it tough for them to find suitable breeding places. Coax them into fly traps. Knock them stiff with fly spray.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Silo Will Beat the Frost

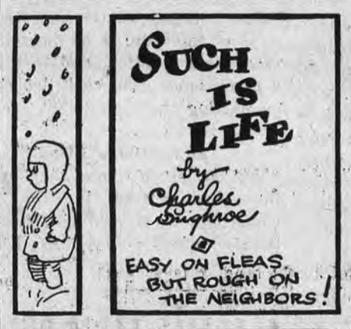
Ensiling corn saves the entire crop. The man with a silo does not dread the early frost, for his silo is ready to receive leaves, ears and stalk. Dry corn fodder which has not lost its leaves, or which has not been leached by fall rains, is excellent feed—but losses are inevitable and can be avoided by ensiling the corn. Ensiling should take place when the kernels are in the glazed stage. The glazed stage is reached when the seed coat has become somewhat shiny, and when the starchy part of the kernel is firm enough to rub up into meal when this starch is removed from the kernel and rubbed between the fingers.—Dakota Farmer.

Sowing Millet

It would not be advisable to seed millet, alfalfa, timothy and clover together. Millet is calculated for hay and the plants grow very thick, requiring a good deal of available fertility. All of this would be detrimental to seeding out with the clovers and grass. The same objection may be given for not seeding down with sudan grass. The earlier the grass and clover seed can be sown the better for a good catch and stand. Barley is a good nurse crop. Sometimes land is seeded out about the time millet and sudan grass is sown but the clover and grass seed is sown alone and gets off to a sufficient start to be all right for entering the winter conditions safely.

Now Moth Control

A new method of codling moth control, the use of chemically-treated bands, which promises to save Indiana apple growers thousands of dollars a year, has been developed as a result of four years of research by the department of entomology at Purdue university. G. E. Marshall, of the Purdue staff, reports that in one orchard alone in 1931 approximately 134,000 codling moth larvae were captured and destroyed through the use of these bands.



THE STORY OF McMINN

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Emeritus Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

I'd like to tell briefly the story of McMinn with the hope that it might help some other boy or act as a deterrent of some indulgent parent who is tempted to make life too easy for his child. I've just come from talking to McMinn, and I feel pretty low in spirits for there wasn't really very much that one could say to him. He seems to have played most of his cards and lost.

McMinn has never done anything that he found unpleasant or difficult.

His father is rather a preoccupied business man who lives in one of the suburbs of a great city and who goes off in the morning usually before the boy is up, and who comes home at night tired and too much taken up with other things to give the boy much attention. Mother has had the direction of the boy, and she is so fond of him that whatever he shows a desire for she gets him immediately, for there has never been any need of economy in the McMinn family and no tendency toward practicing it.

McMinn has never shown any particular interest in study. He was sent to a boys' private school at first, but he did not do well there, and so was transferred to the public school where he finally made the grade to enter high school. His preparatory school record was rather a hectic one. He had all sorts of experience—local high school, two or three high-grade preparatory schools in New England, and then back in high school again to graduate two years later than the average boy does, and even then with only a mediocre record.

And then McMinn came to college. He had really never studied any; he found no joy or satisfaction in study. He was warned, but he paid no attention to the warning, and, of course, he has failed hopelessly.

What is he to do? he asks me. He has no background, no preparation for college work, no idea of what it is all about. He would make out sadly at manual labor. He would have a hard time to get a job unless he got it through his father's influence, and he has developed habits which it will take him years to break if he ever succeeds in doing so.

Says WILL ROGERS

BEVERLY HILLS—Well all I know is just what I read in the papers. And what I run into here and there. I made a little "Razee" around among some old friends down in Texas along after the Democrats had done their "Durndest" at Chicago. First down into Oklahoma and then Texas. Fourth of July sneaked up on me before I had even a firecracker or knew the day was anywhere near me.

I was down around the old home place at Claremore and they said the next day as a big "Rodeo" up at Nowata. Well thats right near. I knew they would be having a lot of "Calf Missings" at various towns on the Fourth, so I was glad to get to go to this one, for there I met a lot of old boys that I had been raised with. Some of em still roping. They sure did have a nice little show. You know Oklahoma and Texas is the home of the Contest Roper. The North is the place for the bucking horse riders, but go south if you want to see em throw some mean loops.

I was just thinking when I was looking at that show the Fourth, it was at a little Fourth of July celebration at Claremore just 35 miles from this one, on July Fourth 1899 (Boy thats 33 years ago) they had a steer roping, and I went into it. It was the first one I ever was in the very first thing I ever did in the way of appearing before an audience in my life. Just such a show as I was looking at now (only ours was not so skilled, all these things have advanced).

Well as I look back on it now I know that that had quite an influence on my little career, for I kinder got to running around to em, and the first thing I knew I was just plum "Honery" and fit for nothing but show business. Once you are a showman you are plum ruined for manual labor again.

I had an awful good little horse that really put me in the business. A little Dun, (yellow) poney, called "Comanche." All the old timers will remember him. He put you up so close to a steer that you dident rope him, you just reached over and put a "Hackimore" on him. Some of the old timers brought him up there the other day. "Jimmie Kane" rider, who could throw a loop out, turn it over and make the catch we called the "Johnny Blocker" right on his head.

This calf roping has all come in the last few years after they had stopped steer roping. A man might be good at one and not nessasarily good at the other. And here is something you might not know, or have noticed. A steer roping horse, and a calf roping horse is not the same animal. You see when you rope steers you catch em, throw your slack rope over his rear axle and then run your horse on by him, having him roped by the head, but the rope going over behind him, therefore jerking his all four feet from under him. Then the horse is supposed to keep pulling and dragging him as he attempts to get up, that is pulling away from him, with his tail to the steer. Now in calf roping the minute you catch your calf, the horse is stopped. You jump off and go throw the calf yourself, and the horse is to keep the rope tight, but his head is towards the calf, and he does it by backing up, instead of pulling away like with a steer. Course you can in rare instances have a horse that you can work both ways, but most of em have two different horses, and say they mean about 50 or 60 percent of the game, the horses do.

Some of these old real ranch hands that never miss a calf on the prairie get the old buck fever when the crowd is there, and naturally they all go home feeling bad about it, and get a good joshing about it till the next time. The contests where everybody knows everybody is always interesting. That is the smaller ones where there is not much what you might call professional talent. (That is boys who make it a business, and just follow that game exclusively). Still they are a mighty fine, nice bunch of boys. I tell you there is lots of different ways the people have got to be entertained.

In years gone by no one ever thought splendid livings would be made by exhibition of things that was a part of ones every day work, but the folks got to have amusements. And the old calf, the steer, and bucking horse, they dont care much, they go back to the range and tell their stay at home cronies what they did at the "Big Fair." Think of the hero a calf is when he goes home and says, Bob Crosby missed me." Well I am going to practice up, and from now on if you see an old fellow with long beard roping in the "Centennial Contest," thats old man Rogers coming to life again.

"Gentlemen's Agreement" A Question. You Answer A Girl to Be Proud Of Plenty of Great Ones

Italy, France, Britain are reported to be united in a "gentlemen's agreement." Under that agreement, according to good authority, not one of those nations will repay any part of its debt to Uncle Sam without the knowledge and approval of the others. If that is called "gentlemen's agreement," what would Europe call the other kind of agreement?

It is announced that President Hoover and Mr. Bennett of the Canadian government have agreed on digging the St. Lawrence canal. It would give ocean ships access to Great Lakes cities and mid-western farms. The price suggested—$800,000,000—would be cheap.

The proposed St. Lawrence canal will have two dams, developing 2,000,000 electric horse-power. One will be in Ontario, one in New York state. Will Canada's share of the power be owned and used by the people of Canada, sold to Canadians at half the price charged in the United States, as happens at Niagara falls?

And will New York's share of the state power be owned by private individuals, taking "all the traffic will bear" and charging double the price of power in Canada, as now happens with private United States companies at Niagara falls?

How would you bet on that question?

An energetic, ambitious young woman is Amelia Earhart Putnam. The power that you see in her eyes is genuine. Except for failure of her gas pump, which compelled a stop in Ohio, she would have "hopped" from ocean to ocean, non-stop, defeating all records.

As it is, she sets a new long distance record, flying 2,019 miles without a stop, 19 miles farther than she went on her non-stop flight across the Atlantic recently.

This is a young lady to be proud of, and the wonderful fact is that there are a million like her in the United States, with just as much will power and ambition, waiting to be discovered.

George Barnard Shaw says there are "no great men or great women" alive or dead, and "People believe in them as they used to believe in dragons and unicorns."

Shaw is mistaken. There have been and there are great men and women. Pasteur was one, Edison another; Copernicus, Tycho-Brahe, Kepler, Galileo, Descartes and Newton were six others coming, by the way, from six different countries.

Every mother who devotes her life to her children is a great woman; every father who devotes his life and energies to his family is a great man. For in all "greatness" the chief ingredient is "goodness."

The death of Thomas Bata, killed in Czechoslovakia when his private plane crashed, is a great loss to the industrial world. Born fifty-six years ago in Moravia, he was the son of a poor cobbler, learned his father's trade and thirty-eight years ago had a shop with fifty employees.

When he died, flying over one of his many factories, he dominated the manufacturing of shoes throughout the world, made gigantic shipments to this country in spite of the tariff, and was called in Europe "the Henry Ford of Europe."

His death is a calamity. His life proved that opportunity is always at hand for those that combine courage with ability.

A wise man from India whose name was Shri Meher Baba, came from India not long ago, announced as "The Holy Man" who had not spoken a word for seven years. He was to open his mouth and speak on important things on arriving.

Now he says his silence will continue because "conditions are not yet right." Wise Mr. Baba. He should be elected to congress.

The British empire, all its members, hold a powwow at Ottawa. The idea is to establish free trade within the empire, as we have free trade within our forty-eight states.

Part of the plan is to buy as little as possible outside the empire, a virtuous plan.

But Canada will not forget that this country has been buying from 80 to 90 per cent of her newsprint and wood pulp, 90 per cent of her exports of fresh fish. We buy largely from Britain also, one-third of her linen exports and 43 per cent of her tin.

The British empire has more than fifteen hundred millions invested in this country, two-thirds of it Canadian money. This country has five thousand millions invested in British industries throughout the empire. The situation calls for wisdom.

Moscow announces Russia has sowed one million fewer acres of wheat than was planned. However, on July 1, more than 241,000,000 acres had been sown, and that is not doing badly. Such a crop means 400,000 square miles of wheat, equal to a strip 15 miles wide from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean.

Five candidates are in the field for the Attalla mayoralty, three of them being ex-mayors. They are A. B. Duke, who is serving his second term; Dr. J. P. Stewart, T. S. Williams, Rush Johnston and Ward Neely.

State banks in Jefferson County which have paid Tax Collector J. W. Hamilton approximately $50,000 in 1931 taxes on capital stock residue, are expected to file suit against the collector soon to recover the tax money paid under protests.

Charlie Douglas was named commander of Birmingham Post No. 1, American Legion, at the annual meeting at the Tutwiler Hotel. In addition to Douglas, James A. Simpson and John D. Higgins were nominated.

Examiner of accounts reported on the office of probate judge of Etowah County from 1926 to 1932 show the records were neat and orderly, and kept in conformity with the law. The report, was made public by Gov. Miller.

Mrs. W. P. Reeves, 50, well known throughout this section of the state, wife of Dr. W. P. Reeves, pastor of the First Baptist Church, of Tuskegee, died at the pastorium in Tuskegee after a lingering illness.

In order that many crippled children in the four counties may receive surgical attention to give them the freedom of the use of their bodies, the Alabama Society for Crippled Children has decided to put on a campaign in Colbert, Lauderdale, Franklin and Lawrence Counties to get new members.

IMPORTANCE OF BEING IMPORTANT

Matter of Moment, as You Look at It.

"The importance of being important is, it seems to me, too disturbingly impressive to the people who would like to be, or, at any rate, seem to be, important," said Mr. Cato Ninetails. "If course, there are people who are undoubtedly important, but it is not so much the result of their special efforts to be important as of a combination of circumstances and their individual talents. That is to say, they are not important merely because they want to be important, but because of the natural order of things. There are other people who are not important, but who seem to be important. I don't know whether this is merely the result of chance or is brought about by good management. Which ever it is, it seems to require no great effort by them, and they undoubtedly fool a great many people. Sometimes I suspect that they even fool themselves. There are still others of high ambition—or perhaps strong egotism—who notwithstanding their vast expenditure of effort, thought and imagination, are unable to make themselves seem important; and their persistence is a trial to their own nerves, and an irritation or, even worse, a bore to their acquaintances.

"Now, is seems to me that being important must be rather burdensome, and seeming to be important is even more so. On him who is important many things are loaded that, by rights, should be carried by other people, but with his peculiar talents I doubt that he finds oppressive a load that would crush most of the rest of us. Importance is his job in the world, and he is built to endure it. It is not likely that the burden of imitation importance—that is, that carried by the people who seem important—is nearly so heavy; added to the workaday pack of him who is important it is probable that it would hardly be noticed; but for the carriers it is sometimes so great that close observation shows that now and then they stagger under it for all their knack of maintaining misleading appearances. Theirs is a hard life, but they like it because so many people think that they are important.

"My sympathy goes out to those who want to seem important, and can't. They strive so hard, and achieve so little. Nor do they ask much, for while they would undoubtedly like to be important, they would be fairly well content if they could just manage to seem important. Life with them must be a succession of disappointments, of trial and error, with error predominating. It seems to me that somebody whose oral flow and command of expression were equal to it should explain to them that they do not know when they are well off, for not being important is one of the easiest—if not the easiest—of life's assignments. He who is important pays for it with hard work, however equal to the task he may be; he who seems to be important pays for it with worry, whatever the degree of tranquility he may present to the world; he who fails in his efforts to seem important must find a bitter tang in all life's savors; on the other hand, he who is willing to leave the job of being important, or seeming important, to others is relieved of many of life's most arduous requirements. His responsibilities are light and his obligations are lighter, for he does not, like the people who are important or who seem important, have to be all things to all men. It is his privilege to get out of the hurly burly for a contemplative period now and then, and thank his lucky stars that he has no aspirations that interfere with a quiet and comfortable life.

"'What things do you regard as important nowadays?' I asked Buck.

"'How would I know?' he responded.

"'Why shouldn't you know?'

"'Only the historians of century hence will be able to tell what was important nowadays.'"—Indianapolis News.

Old Custom Retained

The letters "L. S." on legal documents are the abbreviation of Latin "locus signilli," meaning place for the seal. The Romans used to take off their signet rings and imprint their seals on all documents, and the present legal practice is a survival of that custom.

Slapped by "Her Majesty"

At the age of eighty-six a scientist and electrician won a fresh reputation by delivering one of the wittiest and most entertaining after-dinner speeches ever heard in the Savoy hotel, London, writes Henri Pickard in the Cincinnati Enquirer. This pioneer octogenarian was Col. C. E. Crompton, the Faraday medallist of 1922, who was accorded a complimentary dinner by admirers, friends and colleagues.

In a voice that could easily be heard throughout the large hall, Colonel Crompton acknowledged the compliments paid him by telling some amusing stories of his early scientific days.

"I am about the only person who has ever been slapped by such a model of dignity as Queen Victoria," he declared. "That happened in '81 or '82, when I introduced into Windsor castle the type of lighting which you see in this room today. Of course, it is common now, but at that time it was a novelty.

"Her majesty said she had never seen anything like it before and promptly slapped my face.

"But when other people admired the light she was very fair about it. When someone wanted to introduce me later Queen Victoria waved him aside with the remark: 'This young man had the cheek to have his own way, and his own way happened to be right.'"

SAVING OUR COUNTRY FROM TAX DESTRUCTION

"Tax reduction must be accomplished.

"No other problem, except unemployment, so vitally affects every citizen. It strikes rich and poor alike the small business and the large one. It is directly related to the business depression in that it discourages industrial activity and investment of capital. High taxes are the great enemy of progress of all kinds.

Leading foreign nations of the world are staggering under intolerable tax burdens. That fact alone is a powerful argument to try and keep this government from being submerged by a similar burden of public debt. If we are to remain the economic leader of the world we must have a government that is run efficiently and at the lowest possible cost. Otherwise, we will sink to the common level of other debt-ridden nations.

"It is but true, to say that there is but one way to lower taxes—for government to spend less money. The creation of new forms of taxation, of special or class taxes, solves nothing. It should be the duty of government, local, state, and national, to aid the general economic recovery by adopting stringent economies and tax reduction programs.

CLOSING OUT AT PUBLIC SALE

After four years of failure in an attempt to operate a nation's business, we, the undersigned receivers of the G. O. P. will by authority of the American voters, offer for sale in Washington, District of Columbia, on March 4th, 1932, to the highest and best bidder, for cash in hand, the following worthless equipment, ruined in a great engineering experiment:

One Wild Jack-ass, not broken to work in harness.

One large G. O. P. political machine, 1921 model, in bad repair and operated the last four years by remote control.

Several thousand brass and copper stills in good working order, made available through failure of the "noble experiment."

Thirteen thousand stool pigeons, just about feathered out.

Thirteen million dinner pails, all empty.

Four million soup bowls and other bread line equipment.

One Federal Farm Board with several broken and warped planks. This was used in 1928 for "farm relief" but it has relieved many of their farms and homes.

Eight thousand closed banks with an abundance of frozen assets.

All of these articles are the property of the Republican Party and are the direct product of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law.

Lunch will be served on the grounds by members of the Farm Board with members of the Wickersham Commission as honor guests.

All articles purchased at the sale will be neatly wrapped in a worthless bond of a foreign government.

All checks presented by purchases must bear a charge of two cents.

Right to reject any and all bids reserved, and bids by cabinet members will not be received.

Please do not forget place and date, as parking space will be at a premium. It is suggested that American workmen who desire to attend the sale leave one car in the garage.

You ned not bring drinks, as "grape concentrate" will be available on the grounds.

SIMON D. CONFESS,
Chairman Receivers Board.

Correct Attest:
ROBERT M. LUCKLESS,
Secretary to Board.

BIG THINGS

Congratulations, LaFollette's Magazine Republican, on your recent issue in which you printed the sum total of accomplishments made by the present national administration! You, in preference to other magazines, should know, and do know, undisputable and undenied facts. Big things were promised the people of the United States by the Old Guard when it was making its Hoover Presidential campaign four years ago, and when its nominee even assayed the abolition of poverty. Well, "big things" have occurred. Facts cannot be disputed and the record of accomplishment speaks for itself. Following is a partial list of the greater "accomplishments" as written in the Republican LaFollette's Magazine:

"The biggest financial panic ever known.

"The biggest number of men and women out of work.

"The biggest bread lines.

"The biggest bank failure in history of the United States.

The biggest list of bank crashes.

"The biggest failure, the Insull holding companies.

"The biggest peace-time deficit in the federal budget.

"The biggest amount of unprofitable bonds ever unloaded upon us.

"The biggest drop in the price of farmer's products.

"The biggest moratorium.

"The biggest lack of leadership in national government.

"The biggest amount of hoarding, principally by the banks.

"The biggest lot of wage cuts.

"Well, this is a big country, and we do big things in a big way!"

Other Newspapers Say

RETIRING FROM BUSINESS

The latest statement of the Federal Farm Board indicates an early end of the government's experiment with "price stabilization.' Of the vast stock of 329,000,000 bushels of wheat purchased by the board with public funds, at prices about twice those now prevailing, less than 30,000,000 remain on hand. The rest has been liquidated through ordinary commercial channels at the rate of 5,000,000 bushels a month, through donations of wheat to the Red Cross on authority of Congress, or through special arrangements with foreign governments, such as the sale of 15,000,000 bushels to China on generous credit terms and the "swapping" with Brazil of 25,000,000 bushels for 1,050,000 bags of coffee. The board has made less rapid progress in disposing of its cotton. But of the 1,300,000 bale in which it invested, in this case at prices nearly three times those now quoted, 500,000 have been donated by Congress to the Red Cross and 650,000 will be placed on the market during the twelve months beginning August 1. As the chairman of the board says, "stabilization" is "just about out of the picture."

With so little of the stocks originally accumulated, it would be logical to disband the board, to give the Department of Agriculture power to dispose of the remnants of its holdings and to restore to the Treasury whatever funds are realized by liquidation. Unfortunately, this is considered bad politics in a Presidential year. To scrap the board is to confess failure of "stabilization." At least until the campaign is over, the Administration believes it must continue to affirm that the board accomplished noble work in "cushioning" the fall prices, though the "cushion" was provided by the public purse, and though farm prices have fallen by a larger percentage in the United States during the last two years than in England, France or Germany. How large a loss the American taxpayer will ultimately be forced to accept in consequence of the Government's unsuccessful effort to hold prices at an artificial level will be determined only when the board has disposed of its ast wheat and cotton. At best it will be in the neighborhood of $225,000,000—a large price to pay for evidence that the law of supply and demand is still in operation.—N. Y. Times.

WOMAN'S PRIVILEGE

Ruth Bryan Owen, defeated for renomination in the Florida primaries, said she would resign her seat, because she did not believe that members repudiated by their constituencies should continue to represent them, even through a lame duck session. This moved The Evening Sun to remark that > she snatches out of her defeat a larger share of the respect of the country than she ever commanded in victory, and furthermore that, > here is a member of Congress who will not seize a personal advantage simply because it is legal.

But the other day Mrs. Owen announced that she has changed her mind, and will not resign, after all.

Well, far be it from us to deny any woman the femimine privilege of changing her mind. Even if she goes into Congress, she remains a women, with the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining.

Our only regret is that as Ruth changes her mind, she also changes the whole situation. So all the nice things we have said about her are rendered null, void and of no effect and are hereby withdrawn.—Baltimore Evening Sun.

News and Views

By THOMAS W. PRIMM

On the opposite side of the Pullman where I was sitting a few years ago was a chronic grumbler.. He had been finding fault with everything and everybody since we left Cleveland.

What a wonderful tribute it is to human nature to hear the criticisms of a chronic grumbler.

We folks who are usually happy and pretty well satisfied with people generally, find little fault with human nature, but the chronic complainer knows exactly how mean he feels toward others and from that mental viewpoint, he thinks he sees human nature.

Human nature is about the same the world over. It has never changed, nor will it ever change.

Be decent to human nature and you will like it.

No capital, no merchandise, no business location, no brains is necessary to se up in grumbling business . No character is required to find fault with others.

You often wonder why so many cheap and undesirable grumblers are out of captivity and I'll tell you why.

Anybody with common sense and a sense of humor doesn't give a hang for a human with a hang-nail on his heart.

Anybody with a lick of sense knows that the chronic complainer, the grumbler, finds his chief consolation in being inconsolable and his greatest pleasure in being displeased.

Before the World War, the belief in immortality was on the wane, for then all eyes were enthusiastically keen on commercial supremacy or personal success.

Before the World War, the soft lines of reverence for the spiritual had been almost destroyed .

In 1914 clouds of great gloom changed conditions. The terrible thing that destroyed our loved ones, placed our minds in different position, and we began to believe that the "blank wall of death" was not all.

Then came that comparatively small gang of thugs, crooks, and murderers—that tough element that looms so large because of their desperate deeds, but our population as a whole is not that way.

There are enough right-minded people to lead us hopefully on—on and on in the firm belief that in the future there is a Realm for rewarding those who have confidence in their creator.

Not in years has there been a wider spiritual awakening than now, and there you have the deciding battle of the World War.

A home is where you live. It is the place where you eat and sleep. The roof is to keep out the rain and the walls for protection. There may be music, books, and games for amusements, and the same can be said concerning a hotel or orphan asylum.

But the real home is where personal love and affection is present, and that may be found in a thatched cabin, in a city flat, or in a magnificent mansion on the Avenue.

A real home is made out of happy, harmonious hearts that truly love one another. Any other "home" is but a house.

Looking Things Over

George H. Miller

"I do not agree with a word that you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."—Voltaire.

As distinguished an educator as Dr. Judd would have extreme difficulty in convincing me that education is the cure-all for every social ill in democracy. Education, although some of us think otherwise, cannot work miracles. To ascribe to formalized schooling all the virtues of revealed religion is to immediately label it "nostrum" and categorically relegate it to the status of phrenology, voodooism, and spiritualism.

I am personally convinced that many of those fetishes which have been attached to education hafe done more harm than good to the cause of learning. The old fashioned country doctor was accustomed to prescribe sulphur and molasses for all manner of sickness. Modern medicine has outgrown that sort of blanket treatment. Die-hards among educators may still believe that their rote systems are curative remedies whenever the health of democracy fails. Unfortunately, we have not outlived the beliefs of these venders of "hokum".

Not long ago I read a newspaper report on work done by the Extension Division of one of the larger Middle Western state universities in extending the "benefits" of adult education to the inmates of the commonwealth's penal institutions. The type of courses open to prisoners might be made truly "useful"—in line with the new-fangled theories of educating en masse". I humbly suggest that the Elements of Plumbing or an Advanced Course in Metal Working be given to all convicted safe-breakers. The forger would profit, methinks, from a course in penmanship. By the study of higher mathematics, which might be made prerequisite to all learning undertaken, our prison population might develop the power of logical and extended thought. The net result of such training would be that our criminally inclined brethren would make fewer mistakes. Consequently the crowded conditions of our penitentiaries would be alleviated.

Someday in the far distant future when another H. G. Wells looks over the history of the past two thousand years, I wonder whose names he will set down as "leading all the rest." With the myopia of mortal men, we have raised a multitude of popular heroes. Whether the Olympian heights to which we commend our modern heroes are the top of molehills, we cannot say. The men, who are achieving respect and admiration today and receive the plaudits of the world, are strange heroes. They have their place—intrepid flyers over lonely seas, brutish ice-men on the gridiron, and glittering heroes of the flickering screen. . But in the nature of things, under the pressure of time, the fame of those we worship currently is bound to diminish. Sometimes I fear that we have lost our sanity. That this indiscriminate worship of heroes created through the media of rumor and artifice is dangerous and it beyond the bounds of reasons. What has been happening might even be interpreted as a decadence of human values—and who knows, of human glory.

In later life men and women have time to learn the luxury of being very thoughtful, tactful and kindly. Not because they are naturally any better than their younger friends, not because they have traveled on life's way much further and have the advantage of looking much further over what they have done and left undone with some of their errors causing painful stings.

We learn by living. We learn that the memory of no generous or kindly act has ever given our higher nature any cause for regret.

Young folks have not traveled far and they are more liable to act on impulse, while the older folks have been punished severely for their sudden spurts of temper or lack of tact—our unkindly acts.

The older folk cannot retrace their steps or rectify their past mistakes and that makes them more careful. Neither can they remodel their young friends, nor can they reconcile them to the truth about the luxury of being more thoughtful, tactful and kindly.

My point is all here in this thought which is worth recording: Every enemy a man makes is an added liability: every friend, an asset.

RAMBLING REMARKS

By The Rambler

Buxton made this statement several years ago but now it is again worthy of our thought. "The longer I live, the more deeply I am convinced that that which makes the difference between one man and another—between the weak and the powerful, the great and the insignificant—is energy, invincible determination, a purpose once formed and then death or victory."

Yes, it is good to have money and the things it can buy but it's still better to check up once in a while to make sure you haven't lost those things that can't be bought.

Man always has to elbow himself thru the world giving and taking offense for no man lives thru life without jostling and being jostled.

Colton, in a moment of reflection came to this conclusion, "A bed is a bundle of paradoxes; we go to it with reluctance, yet we quit it with regret; we make up our minds every night to leave it early, but we make up our bodies every morning to keep it late".

It would be far easier for us to work if we tried to improve the quality of it as hard as we try to find excuses for not properly attending to it.

We understand the state is going to have a survey made of the proposed road from the Birmingham-Harpersville Highway thru Chelsea to Columbiana. This survey is being made according to several to determine the cost of this much needed road but we hope and feel that it will mean the building of this road in the near future. There is no road in the county more needed than this proposed one and unless it is built the business of Columbiana will suffer from the traffic being shunted around the town.

Recently we had the pleasure of hearing Joseph Marino of Birmingham give a recital from the "Singing Tower" of the First Presbyterian Church of Birmingham. It was thrilling to be on the street and hear old familiar songs being played on a set of twenty-five bells hung in this old church tower. Marino is one of the pioneer bellmasters of this country and possibly the youngest and it takes a real artist to master the carillon. Listen for these bells next time you are in Birmingham on Sunday afternoon. Really, they are worth going there just to hear, for in hearing them you will be uplifted and inspired.

Did you ever stop to think that even though beauty is only skin deep that it is deep enough to satisfy a reasonable man?

Someone recently said, "Life's most heroic gesture is to courageously and graciously decend from a high to a low income."

The following article appeared recently without a signature but here we give credit to its author whoever he may be for being a deep thinker and judge of men.

"Who is a friend? I will tell you. He is a person with whom you dare be yourself. Your soul can go naked with him. He seems to ask of you to put nothing on, only to be what you are. He does not want you to be better or worse. When you are with him you feel as a prisoner feels who has been declared innocent. You do not have to be on your guard. You can say what you think as long as it is genuinely you. He understands those contradictions in your nature that lead others to misjudge you. With him you breathe free. You can avow your little vanities and envies and hates and vicious sparks, your meanness and absurdities, and in opening them up to him, they are lost, dissolving on the white ocean of his loyalty. He understands. You do not have to be careful. You can abuse him, neglect him, tolerate him. Best of all you can keep still with him. It makes no matter. He likes you. He is like fire that purges all you do. He is like water that cleanses all that you say. He is like wine that warms you to the bone. He understands you. You can weep with him, laugh with him, pray with him. Through and underneath it all he sees, knows and loves you. A friend, I repeat, is one with whom you dare to be yourself and whom you can trust."

It must be a pleasure to attend a meeting and not be dunned for a contribution or appointed a member of a committee.

Sooner or later we all realize that just because it's a well-beaten road is no sign it's the right one.

If the women aren't careful they'll win so much freedom that the men wil cease to feel any responsibility for them.

home program, Mr. Ford said. Consequently, the net cash balance is larger, soil is being improved by more livestock and legumes, and other benefits are attained.

"In addition to more cows, chickens, and hogs our farmers are interested in better livestock, better feeding, and better management," Mr. Ford said. "They are trying to hold their cost down to the minimum in order to leave a net profit. We believe that this plan of farming will do much to put farming on a more profitable basis and also improve business done by our bankers, merchants, and professional men."

INSPIRING HISTORY OF SHELBY COUNTY CITED BY RESIDENT

(Editors Note: The following article on Shelby County was prepared by Judge E. S. Lyman, Sr., of Montevallo and was given by him in a radio address some time ago as part of a Protective Life Insurance program over station WAPI. To those who did not hear the radio talk the Democrat, with the consent of Judge Lyman, reproduces the "History of Shelby County" below for its readers.)

To trace the origin and early history of this county we should go back to the days of the Mississippi Territory, which was organized in 1814, following the campaign of General Andrew Jackson against the Indians and which included the territory now occupied by the states of Mississippi, and Alabama; extending from the Mississippi River to the west line of the state of Georgia. In 1817, Mississippi, anticipating statehood, was divided approximately in half and the eastern part became Alabama Territory. The counties of Mississippi which were carried or partly carried into Alabama Territory retained their identity of names, officers and jurisdiction, for all purposes of the new Territory.

Originally the territory now in Shelby County was embraced in Washington County, Mississippi which according to my recollection of history, reached across the whole width of the Territory—that is, from the Mississippi River to the Georgia line. June 5th, 1815, Governor Holmes, of Mississippi Territory, by proclamation, established Monroe County, carved, at least in part, from Washington County and embracing nearly half the present area of Alabama and including that now in Shelby County. December 6, 1816, the legislature of Mississippi Territory carved from Monroe County the county of Montgomery, which thus succeeded to the area now in Shelby. Thus we were related at the time of the establishment of Alabama Territory. This new Territory began functioning the 19th day of January, 1818, the legislature having convened at St. Stephens in Washington County. Only seven counties had representatives, viz: Mobile, Baldwin, Washington, Clarke, Madison, Limestone and Lauderdale. The House was composed of thirteen members, the Senate of one—James Titus. This 'Senate' or 'Council' as then called, is still considered unique in the history of representative legislative bodies. Historian Pickett thus refers to the 'Senate': "He sat alone and decided upon the acts of the lower house, and adjourned and met again with a show of formality quite ludicrous.' William Wyatt Bibb, a native of Virginia, had been appointed Governor.

"Among the earlier acts of this legislature was that of February 7th, 1818, creating Shelby County, carved out of Montgomery, for the most part. Five days later Cahaba, (now Bibb County), was created and originally included about half of the present Shelby, though the line was soon changed approximately according to the present dividing line.

The second Territorial legislature, in November, 1818, sliced Saint Clair county out of Shelby.

"In 1832, by treaty with the Creek Indians, the territory then occupied by that tribe, lying between the Coosa River on the west, Georgia on the east, Montgomery county on the south and the country of the Muskogee Tribe on the North, was seceded to the United States and preparations were made for the migration of the Creeks to west of the Mississippi. The territory thus acquired was added to Shelby County ,which became 'Imperial'.

"It was commonly defined as extending "from Dallas County to Rome, Georgia', a statement almost literally true. However, the distinction was short-lived, Shelby proving to be merely a conduit for the projection of other counties; out of this extensive, valuable domain soon emerged, for the most parts, nine sizeable counties; viz: Benton, (Now Calhoun), Barbour, Chambers, Coosa, Macon, Randolph, Russell Talladega and Tallapoosa. Some of these have in turn largely contributed to the formation of still later counties; as, Clay from Talladega and Clebourne from Calhoun.

December 30, 1868, Baker (now Chilton County), was created from portions of Autauga, Shelby, Bibb and Perry. The subsequent changes of the lines of Shelby County have consisted of minor adjustments between it and adjoining counties for the accommodations of 'liners' or to conform to land lines or natural boundaries.

"This county was named in honor of Isaac Shelby, one of those redoubtable colonels, pioneers who, independently of the regular, patriot army, fought and won the celebrated battle of King's Mountain, turned the tide of the Revolution back from the invasion of the Carolinas by Cornwalis to the path of his surrender at Yorktown. Colonel Shelby was, dominantly, instrumental in planning and forcing that battle under what appeared to be adverse conditions, but which resulted so gloriously for the valiant pioneers.—A victory, in my opinion, without a parallel in our military annals. After this battle Colonel Shelby returned to his New Kentucky Home. He was a native of Maryland. He was the first governor of Kentucky, served two terms as such and, during the second war with Great Britain rendered all the aid he could to the Federal cause. He was appointed by President Monroe to be Secretary of War of the United States, but, on account of advanced age, was constrained to decline the honor.

"Shelby County, in common with numerous other counties, cities and towns, is proud to bear his name.

"The Act creating the county provided for commissioners to select a county seat and that, in the meantime courts should be held at the house of William Wallace, who I am informed, resided in the neighborhood of where Pelham now is. Apparently the commissionegrs dead-locked on the question of permanent location and a new commission was appointed to determine it, resulting in favor of "Shelbyville", likewise near Pelham, the exact location I have never been able to ascertain. Thomas A. Rogers, a native of Pennsylvania, a lawyer, contracted to build the first court house for the munificant sum of fifty dollars. Specifications provided for a house of logs 16 x 24 feet, "the door and four windows to have wooden shutters'. This man, Thomas A. Rogers, in addition to being a lawyer and a builder was the first Secretary of State of Alabama and the first Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Masons of Alabama. He had also been one of the Shelby delegates in the first Constitutional Convention, in Huntsville. He died in Cahaba, in 1823 and his body was brought to Shelby County for burial. His grave is probably unmarked and forgotten.

"In 1826, the county seat, after an exciting contest between Coosa and Cahaba Valley citizens—Columbiana being the sole candidate for the one and Montevallo and Ebenezer both for the other was located in Columbiana, the victory being celebrated by boring and charging with powder a large pine tree which, being exploded shattered the great tree and, according to Dr. E. B. Teague, who wrote extensively of his reminiscences, was heard by his people, who lived some eight miles or more, away. The seat of government still remains in Columbiana, although another contest was waged for it by Calera.

"The county, according to the last census, contains an area of 819 square miles, just north of the geological center of the state. Its population is given at 27,576, an increase of only 479 over the 1920 census.

"Previously it had been gaining at the rate of approximately 3,000 per decade. This population is now composed, principally, of natives of the county, whose forbears, for the most part, came from Georgia, Tennessee, the Carolinas and Virginia, though I have known some from as far away as Vermont and Maine.

"The citizens will compare favorably with Alabamians, generally and have numbered its full quota of notable characters who have figured in the life and advancement of the county and state. It would be impossible, in the limited amount of space, to mention many of them and to name those who have been outstanding might prove to be invidious.

"The topography of the county is irregular; mountainous in the north and west, the elevations gradually diminishing toward the plains south of us. The mountains contain various minerals, though only iron, coal and lime have been developed to an appreciable extent. The brown hematite ores of Shelby, the coal mined from the Cahaba fields, the vast lime deposits at Siluria, Calcis, Pelham, Keystone, Saginaw, Calera and West Calera-Newala, have been extensively developed and still contain fortunes for the adventurers engaged in these enterprises, and around Sterrett are found valuable clays, mostly employed in pottery; but some well suited for modelling Springs, mineral and free, making streams tributary to Coosa River on the east and southeast and to the Cahaba on the North and Northwest, present brightest prospects to the stock-raising and dairying industries which, just now are being projected in the county. Shelby Springs, located on the Southern Railway, a few miles east of Calera, have long been noted for their curative waters.

"The Coosa Valley, nestling between the mountains and the Coosa River and in the commercial zones of Vincent, Harpersville and Wilsonville, is justly designated "The Garden Spot of Shelby". Much of it is alluvial, rich soil. The various soils below, to the South of it, is only less productive. Agriculture, of course, is the chief industry of the county. With the aforementioned advantages and its salubrious climate, every plant-life that will grow in the temperate zone can be made to thrive here. The farmers are making rapid strides i nevery way, especially in better homes and better living.

The county is well served by three railroads and their subsidiary lines. It maintains working health and welfare departments and is conspicuously healthful.

"Churches—usually accompanied by schools—dot the valleys and perch on the hills acessible to all patrons. Consolidated schools have under an improved system provided bus transportation for their students and are constantly increasing the benefits of the system to the citizens.

"The resplendent glory of the county has its habitat in Alabama College, located in Montevallo, the benefits of which permeate to every community of the state.

"A late citizen of the county who had extensively and observantly traveled in all parts of the world was heard repeatedly to remark that here, in Shelby County, nature had done its best in the way of creation and equipment of natural endowments, to make of it a conspicuous part of the best country of the world. To keep it as such for posterity seems to be the growing effort of tis citizens.

curred contrary to law. However, he points out that the people have long acquiesed in this method of conducting the State's business, "and for that reason I think these debts should ultimately be paid, but in so doing we should serve notice that in the future no debts incurred without legal authority will be recognized as an obligation of the State, morally or otherwise."

Mr. Mallory believes that some plan can be devised for handling these back debts whereby the Legislature could issue long time, interest-bearing warrants in such form as might be approved by the Supreme Court. "This should be coupled up with a definite announcement that we are not to have any additional taxation and that expenses and appropriations will be cut to meet the revenue of the State," he stated. No ideal solution, acceptable to everyone, can be found, he believes, "but some such plan would relieve us from the impending fear of increased taxation and would set aside the rule that taxes coming in this year will be used to pay back debts rather than for current expenses. It would also speedily bring about a feeling of satisfaction on the part of the people at large and restore their confidence in the management of State affairs," he points out.

The Lapsley bill, providing for the issuance of warrants along the lines Mr. Mallory suggests, and which the Supreme Court in an advisory opinion held to be unconstitutional, could be re-drafted in such form as to meet these objections. Mr. Mallory believes, and would provide for caring for the retirement of a stated amount of debt each year. Such a plan would allow current funds to be released for current debts, he points out.

In presenting his ideas Mr. Mallory stated that he is sure that some feasible policy along the line he has indicated "will be welcomed by an overburdened people who are weary and depressed because of the condition of our State affairs, brought about by unwise and extravagant policies."

W.N.U SERVICE

THE STORY

Yancey Cravat, just returned from the newly opened Indian territory, relates his experiences to a large gathering of the Venable family. Yancey is married to Sabra Venable; is a criminal lawyer and editor of the Wichita Wigwam. Yancey announces he is going back to the Oklahoma country with Sabra and their four-year-old son, Cimarron. They arrive at Osage, where Yancey intends to start a newspaper. Yancey is determined to find out who killed Editor Pegler of the New Day. Yancey consents to conduct divine worship on Sunday. During the services Yancey announces he has learned who killed Pegler. He stoops in time to escape a bullet fired by Yountis. Still stooping, Yancey shoots and kills Yountis. Then he announces that Yountis killed Pegler. Yancey frustrates a bank robbery and kills two desperadoes. Yancey urges Sabra to join him in the Run at the opening of the Cherokee strip. She refuses. He is gone five years. Dixie Lee and her girls arouse the indignation of the wives and mothers of Osage. The war with Spain begins. Yancey returns in the uniform of a Rough Rider. Dixie Lee is on trial as a public nuisance. Yancey defends her and she is acquitted.

CHAPTER X

It was as though Osage and the whole Oklahoma country now stopped and took a deep breath. Well it might. Just ahead of it, all unknown, waited years of such clangor and strife as would make the past years seem uneventful in comparison. Ever since the day of the Run, more than fifteen years ago, it had been racing helter-skelter, devil take the hindmost; shooting into the air, prancing and yelping out of sheer vitality and cussedness. A man's country it seemed to be, ruled by men for men. The women allowed them to think so. The word feminism was unknown to the Sabra Cravats, the Mrs. Wyatts, the Mrs. Hefners, the Mesdames Turket and Folsom and Sipes. Prim, good women and courageous, banded together by their goodness and by their common resolve to tame the wilderness. Their power was the more tremendous because they did not know they had it. They never once said, during those fifteen years, "We women will do this. We women will change that." Quietly, indomitably, relentlessly, without even a furtive glance of understanding exchanged between them, but secure in their common knowledge of the sentimental American male, they went ahead with their plans.

Yancey had come home from the Spanish-American war a hero. Other men from Osage had been in the Philippines. One had even died there (dysentery and ptomaine from bad tinned beef). But Yancey was the town's Rough Rider. He had charged up San Juan hill with Roosevelt. Osage, knowing Yancey and never having seen Roosevelt, assumed that Yancey Cravat—the Southwest Cimarron—had led the way, an ivory-and-silver-mounted six-shooter in either hand, the great buffalo head lowered with such menace that the enemy had fled in terror.

His return had been the occasion for such a celebration as the town had never known and never would know again, they assured each other, between drinks, until the day when statehood should come to the territory. He returned a captain, unwounded, but thin and yellow, with the livery look that confirmed the stories one had heard of putrid food, typhoid, dysentery, and mosquitoes more deadly, in this semi-tropical country, than bullets or cannon.

Poisoned and enfeebled though he was, his return seemed to energize the crude little town. Wherever he might be he lived in a swirl of events that drew into its eddy all that came within its radius. Hi, Yancey! Hi, Clint! He shed the khaki and the cocked hat and actually appeared again in the familiar white sombrero, Prince Albert, and high-heeled boots. Osage breathed a sigh of satisfaction. His dereliction was forgiven, the rumors about him forgotten—or allowed to subside, at least. Again the editorial columns of the Oklahoma Wigwam blazed with hyperbole.

It was hard for Sabra to take second place (or to appear to take second place) in the office of the Wigwam. She had so long ruled there alone. Her word had been law to the wavering Jesse Rickey and to the worshiping Cliff Means. And now to say, "You'd better ask Mr. Cravat."

"He says leave it to you. He's went out."

Yancey did a good deal of going out. Sabra, after all, still did most of the work of the paper without having the satisfaction of dictating its policy.

A linotype machine, that talented iron monster, now chattered and chittered and clanked in the composing room of the Wigwam. It was the first of its kind in the Oklahoma country.

Sabra was proud of the linotype machine, for it had been her five years at the head of the Wigwam that had made it possible. It was she who had gone out after job printing contracts; who had educated the local merchants to the value of advertising. Certainly Yancey, prancing and prating, had never given a thought to these substantial foundations on which the entire business success of the paper rested. They now got out with ease the daily Wigwam for the Osage townspeople and the weekly for county subscribers.

Five years had gone by—six years since Yancey's return. Yet, strangely enough, Sabra never had a feeling of security. She never forgot what he had said about Wichita. "Almost five years in one place. That's the longest stretch I've ever done, honey." Five years. And this was well into the sixth. He had plunged head first into the statehood fight, into the Indian territory situation. The anti-Indian faction was bitterly opposed to the plan for combining the Oklahoma territory and the Indian territory under the single state of Oklahoma. Their slogan was "The White Man's State for the White Man."

"Who brought the Indian here to the Oklahoma country in the first place?" shouted Yancey in the editorial columns of the Wigwam. "White men. They hounded them from Missouri to Arkansas, from Arkansas to southern Kansas, then to northern Kansas, to northern Oklahoma, to southern Oklahoma. You white men sold them the piece of arid and barren land on which they now live in squalor and misery. It isn't fit for a white man to live on, or the Indians wouldn't be living on it now. Deprived of their tribal laws, deprived of their tribal rites, herded together in stockades like wild animals, robbed, cheated, kicked, hounded from place to place, give them the protection of the country that has taken their country away from them. Give them at least the right to become citizens of the state of Oklahoma."

He was obsessed by it. He traveled to Washington in the hope of lobbying for it. Roosevelt was characteristically cordial to his old campaign comrade. Washington ladies were captivated by the flowery speeches of this romantic, this story-book swaggerer out of the Southwest.

It was rumored on good authority that he was to be appointed the next governor of the Oklahoma territory.

"Oh, Yancey," Sabra said, "do be careful. Governor of the territory! It would mean so much. It would help Cim in the future. Donna, too. Their father a governor." She thought, "Perhaps all that I've gone through in the last ten years will be worth it, now. Perhaps it was this. He'll settle down. . . . Mamma can't say now . . . and all the Venables and the Vians and the Goforths and the Greenwoods. . . ." She had had to endure their pity, even from a distance, all these years.

The rumor took on substance. My husband, Yancey Cravat, governor of the territory of Oklahoma. And then, when statehood came, as it must in the next few years, perhaps governor of the state of Oklahoma. Why not!

At which point Yancey blasted any possibility of his appointment to the governorship by hurling a red-hot editorial into the columns of the Wigwam. The gist of it was that the hundreds of thousands of Indians now living on reservations throughout the United States should be allowed to live where they pleased, at liberty. The whites of the Oklahoma territory and the Indian territory, with an Indian population of about one hundred and twenty thousand of various tribes—Poncas, Cherokees, Chickasaws, Creeks, Osages, Kiowas, Comanches, Kaws, Choctaws, Seminoles, and a score of others—read, emitted a roar of rage, and brandishing the paper ran screaming into the streets, cursing the name of Yancey Cravat.

Much that he wrote was true, perhaps. Yet the plight of the Indian was not as pitiable as Yancey painted it. He cast over them the glamor of his own romantic nature. The truth was that they themselves cared little—except a few of their tribal leaders, more intelligent than the rest. They hunted a little, fished, slept, visited from tribe to tribe, the Poncas visiting the Osages, the Osages the Poncas, gossiping, eating, holding powwows.

Sabra picked up the proof sheet of the editorial, still damp from the press, and walked into Yancey's office. Her face was white, set.

"You're going to run this, Yancey?"

"Yes."

"You'll never be governor of the territory."

"Never."

She stood a moment, her face working. She crushed the galley proof in her hand so that her knuckles stood out, white.

"I've forgiven you many, many things, God knows, in the last ten years. I'll never forgive you for this. Never."

"Yes, you will, honey. Never is a long time. Not while I'm alive, maybe. But some day, a long time from now—though not so very long, maybe—you'll be able to turn back to the old files of the Oklahoma Wigwam and lift this editorial of mine right out of it, word for word, and run it as your own."

"Never. . . . Donna . . . Cim. . ."

"I can't live my children's lives for them, Sabra honey. They've got to live their own. I believe what I believe. This town is rotten—the territory—the whole country. Rotten."

"You're a fine one to say what is or isn't rotten. You with your whisky and your Indians and your women. I despise you. So does every one in the town—in the territory."

"'A prophet is not without honor, save in his own country and in his own home.'" A trifle sonorously.

She never really knew whether he had done this thing with the very purpose of making his governorship impossible. It was like him.

Curiously enough, the editorial, while it maddened the white population of the territory, gained the paper many readers. The Wigwam prospered. Osage blossomed. It was no longer a camp; it was a town. It began to build schools, churches, halls.

Sol Levy's store—the Levy Mercantile company—had two waxen ladies in the window, their features only slightly affected by the burning southwest sun. Yancey boomed Sol Levy for mayor of Osage, but he never had a chance. It was remarkable how the Oklahoma Wigwam persisted, though its position in most public questions was violently unpopular. Perhaps it, like Yancey, had a vitality and a charm that no one could withstand.

Although Sol Levy was still the town Jew, respected, prosperous, the town had never quite absorbed this oriental. A citizen of years' standing, he still was a stranger. He mingled little with his fellow townsmen outside business hours. He was shy of the town women though the women of the town found him kindly, passionate, and generous. The business men liked him. They put him on committees. Occasionally Sabra or some other woman who knew him well enough would say, half playfully, half seriously, "Why don't you get married, Sol? A nice fellow like you. You'd make some girl happy."

Sometimes he thought vaguely of going to Wichita or Kansas City or even Chicago to met some nice Jewish girl there, but he never did. It never entered his head to marry a Gentile.

Between him and Yancey there existed a deep sympathy and understanding. Yancey campaigned for Sol Levy in the mayoralty race—if a thing so one-sided could be called a race. The Wigwam extolled him.

"Why, the very idea!" snorted the redoubtable virago, Mrs. Tracy Wyatt, whose husband was the opposing candidate. "A Jew for mayor of Osage! They'll be having an Indian mayor next. Mr. Wyatt's folks are real Americans. They helped settle Arkansas. And as for me, why, I can trace my ancestry right back to William Whipple, who was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence."

Sol Levy never had a chance for public honor. He, in fact, did practically nothing to further his own possible election. He seemed to regard the whole matter with a remoteness slightly tinged with ironic humor. Yancey dropped into Sol's store to bring him this latest pronouncement of the bristling Mrs. Wyatt.

"Declaration of Independence!" Sol exclaimed, thoughtfully. "Tell her one of my ancestors wrote the Ten Commandments. Fella name of Moses."

Yancey, roaring with laughter, used this in the Wigwam, and it naturally helped as much as anything to defeat the already defeated candidate.

The town went by—Indians, cowboys up from Texas, plainsmen, ranchers. They still squatted at the curb, as in the early days. They chewed tobacco and spat. The big sombrero persisted, and even the boots and spurs.

There was talk of paving Pawhuska avenue, but this did not come for years. The town actually boasted a waterworks. The Wigwam office still stood on Pawhuska, but it now occupied the entire house. Two years after Yancey's return they had decided to build a home on Kihekah street, where there actually were trees now almost ten years old.

Sabra built a white frame house in the style of the day, with turrets, towers, minarets, cupolas, and scroll work. There was a stained glass window in the hall, in purple and red and green and yellow, which, confronting the entering caller, gave him the look of being suddenly stricken with bubonic plague. There were parlor, sitting room, dining room, kitchen on the first floor; four bedrooms on the second floor, and a bathroom, actually, with a full-size bathtub, a toilet, and a marble washstand with varicose veins. In the cellar there was a hot air furnace.

"As long as we're building and furnishing," Sabra said, "it might as well be the best." She had gone about planning the house, and furnishing it, with her customary energy and capability. With it all she found time to do her work on the Wigwam—for without her the paper would have been run to the ground in six months. Osage had long since ceased to consider it queer that she, a woman, and the wife of one of its most prominent citizens, should go to work every morning like a man.

Sabra, in common with the other well-to-do housewives of the community, employed an Indian girl as a house servant. There was no other kind of help available. After her hideous experience with Arita she had been careful to get Indian girls older, more settled, though this was difficult. She preferred Osage girls. These married young, often before they had finished their studies at the Indian school.

Ruby Big Elk had been with Sabra now for three years. A curious, big, silent girl of about twenty-two—almost handsome—one of six children—a large family for an Osage. Sabra was somewhat taken aback, after the girl had been with her for some months, to learn that she already had been twice married.

"What became of your husbands, Ruby?"

"Died."

She had a manner that bordered on the insolent. Sabra put it down to Indian dignity. When she walked she scuffed her feet ever so little, and this, for some inexplicable reason, seemed to add insolence to her bearing. "Oh, do lift your feet, Ruby! Don't scuffle when you walk." The girl made no reply. Went on scuffling. Sabra discovered that she was lame; the left leg was slightly shorter than the right. She did not limp—or, rather, hid the tendency to limp by the irritating sliding sound. Her walk was straight, leisurely, measured. Sabra was terribly embarrassed; apologized to the Indian girl. The girl only looked at her and said nothing. Sabra repressed a little shivver. She had never got accustomed to the Indians.

Ruby's father, Big Elk, had been chief of the Osage tribe by election for ten years, and though he no longer held this highest office, was a man much looked up to in the Osage nation. He had sent his six children and actually his fat wife to the Indian school, but he himself steadfastly refused to speak a word of English, though he knew enough of the language. He conversed in Osage, and when necessary used an interpreter. It was a kind of stubborn Indian pride in him. It was his enduring challenge to the white man. "You have not defeated me."

It slowly dawned on Sabra that young Cim was always to be found lolling in the kitchen, talking to Ruby. Ruby, she discovered to her horror, was teaching Cim to speak Osage. A difficult language to the white, he seemed to have a natural aptitude for it. She came upon them, their heads close together over the kitchen table, laughing and talking and singing. Rather, Ruby Big Elk was singing a song with a curious rhythm, and (to Sabra's ear, at least) no melody. Cim was trying to follow the strange gutturals, slurs, and accents, his eyes fixed on Ruby's face, his own expression utterly absorbed, rapt.

"What are you doing? What is this?"

The Indian girl's face took on its customary expression of proud disdain. She rose. "Teach um song," she said; which was queer, for she spoke English perfectly.

"Well, I must say, Cimarron Cravat! When you know your father is expecting you down at the office—" She stopped. Her quick eye had leaped to the table where lay the little round peyote disk or mescal button which is the hashish of the Indian.

She had heard about it; knew how prevalent among the Indian tribes from Nebraska down to Mexico had become the habit of eating this little buttonlike top of a Mexican cactus plant. In shape a disk about an inch and a half in diameter and a quarter of an inch thick, the mescal or peyote gave the eater a strange feeling of lightness, dispelled pain and fatigue, caused visions of marvelous beauty and grandeur. The use of it had become an Indian religious rite.

Like a fury Sabra advanced to the table, snatched up the little round button of soft green.

"Peyote!" She whirled on Cim. "What are you doing with this thing?"

Cim's eyes cast down sullenly. His hands in his pockets, he leaned against the wall, very limp, very bored, very infuriating and insolent.

"Ruby was just teaching me one of the Mescal ceremony songs. Darned interesting. It's the last song. They sing it at sunrise when they're just about all in. Goes like this."

To Sabra's horror he began an eerie song as he stood there leaning against the kitchen wall, his eyes half closed.

"Stop it!" screamed Sabra. With the gesture of a tragedy queen she motioned him out of the kitchen. He obeyed with very bad grace, his going more annoying, in its manner, than his staying. Sabra followed him, silently. Suddenly she realized she hated his walk, and knew why. He walked with a queer little springing gait, on the very soles of his feet. It came over her that it always had annoyed her. She remembered that some one had laughingly told her what Pete Pitchlyn, the old Indian scout, lounging on his street corner, had said about young Cim:

"Every time I see that young Cimarron Cravat a-comin' down the street I expect to hear a twig snap. Walks like a story-book Injun."

In the privacy of the sitting room Sabra confronted her son, the bit of peyote still crushed in her hand.

"So you've come to this! I'm ashamed of you!"

"Come to what?"

She opened her hand to show the button of pulpy green crushed in her palm. "Peyote. A son of mine. I'd rather see you dead—"

"Oh, for heaven's sake, mom, don't get Biblical, like dad. To hear you a person would think you'd found me drugged in a Chinese opium den."

"I think I'd almost rather."

"It's nothing but a miserable little piece of cactus. And what was I doing but sitting in the kitchen listening to Ruby tell how her father—"

"I should think a man of almost eighteen could find something better to do than sit in a kitchen in the middle of the day talking to an Indian girl. Where's your pride!"

Cim's eyes were still cast down. He still lounged insolently, his hands in his pockets. "How about these stories you've told me all your life about the love you southerners had for your servants and how old Angie was like a second mother to you?"

"They were different. They knew their place."

He raised the heavy eyelids then and lifted his fine head with the menacing look that she knew so well in his father. "You're right. They are different. In the first place, Ruby isn't an Indian hired girl. She is the daughter of an Osage chief."

"Osage fiddlesticks! What of it?"

"Ruby Big Elk is just as important a person in the Osage nation as Alice Roosevelt is in Washington."

"Now, listen here, Cimarron Cravat! I've heard about enough. A lot of dirty Indians! Just you march yourself down to the Wigwam office, young man, and don't you ever again let me catch you talking in that disrespectful manner about the daughter of the President of the United States. And if I ever hear that you've eaten a bite of this miserable stuff"—she held out her hand, shaking a little, the mescal button crushed in her palm—"I'll have your father thrash you within an inch of your life, big as you are. As it is, he shall hear of this."

But Yancey, on being told, only looked thoughtful and a little sad. "It's your own fault, Sabra. You're bound that the boy shall live the life you've planned for him instead of the one he wants. So he's trying to escape into a dream life. Like the Indians. It's all the same thing."

"I don't know what you're talking about. I don't think you know, either."

"The Indians started to eat peyote after the whites had taken their religious and spiritual and decent physical life away from them. 'Man cannot live by bread alone.' He has got to have dreams, or life is unendurable. So the Indian turned to the peyote. He finds peace and comfort and beauty in his dreams."

A horrible suspicion darted through Sabra. "Yancey Cravat, have you ever—"

He nodded his magnificent head slowly, sadly. "Many times. Many times."

POULTRY

INFERIOR EGG NOT SOUGHT BY BUYERS

High Quality Production Is Demanded.

(By H. H. ALP, Poultry Extension Specialist, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.)

Fertile eggs caused by keeping roosters in the flocks during the warm summer months have been mainly responsible for bad egg losses which in 1930 cost poultrymen of the state an estimated $5,000,000. In addition to eliminating roosters, if farm flock owners would adopt a few practical and simple practices, much of the poor quality of Illinois eggs could be overcome and market demands for eggs from this state improved.

Eggs should be gathered twice daily or, better still, three times daily in hot weather. Frequent gathering helps prevent damage by heat or cold; it saves cracking and breaking of eggs and it reduces the proportion of dirty eggs.

Before being cased, eggs should be cooled, because egg cases, pads and fillers hold in any heat that already is in the eggs. The cases of eggs should be held in a cool place, a temperature of 32 to 60 degrees being best. On most farms the cellar is the best place available. It is satisfactory for short storage periods if it is free from strong odors and not too damp.

Eggs will keep better and will be easier to sell if they are kept clean. Changing the floor litter and nesting material before it is too badly spoiled helps to keep eggs clean. Dropping boards or, better still, wire-covered dropping boards also help. Crowded quarters are a common cause of dirty eggs. There should be 3½ to 4 square feet of floor space for each hen. A shortage of nests also causes broken and dirty eggs and may lead to the habits of egg eating and of laying eggs on the floor. There should be one nest for each five hens.

Feed Mixtures on Which Chickens Will Thrive

A good mash feed for chicks, when milk is the only drink, is mixed as follows: 150 pounds of ground yellow corn, 100 pounds of wheat bran, 100 pounds of oat flour, 75 pounds of wheat shorts or middlings and 50 pounds of high-grade meat scrap.

When the chicks do not have access to green leafy feed, five pounds of alfalfa leaf meal should be added to each 100 pounds of the mash, says the Dakota Farmer. If meat and bone scrap are not used, three pounds of bone meal should be included to each 100 pounds of mash. One pound of sifted table salt and one pint of high-grade cod-liver oil per 100 pounds of the mash should be mixed in. The cod-liver oil should be mixed with the bran first. Chick-size oyster shell, calcite or high-grade limestone should also be kept available.

Successful Pullet Raising

Eighty March pullets laid 1,150 eggs in 30 days fom October 18 to November 16 for Anna Corrigan, Dakota county, Minnesota.

During that period she fed 300 pounds of commercial egg mash. Scratch feed was composed of two bushels barley and one and a quarter bushels wheat. With alfalfa leaves, oyster shells and three pints of cod-liver oil, feed cost $9.94 and income was $31.68, an average of 33 cents a dozen, or 3 cents above market price. This left a net return of $21.74 or 27 cents a pullet.—Capper's Farmer.

Mash and Milk

Mixing a part of the dry mash with milk until it is moistened to a crumbly state greatly increases the palatability of the poultry ration. Experiments at Ohio State university with chickens of the same breed kept under exactly the same conditions and fed the same rations, with the exception that a part of the ration was fed wet in one case and in the other case all of the ration was dry, showed an increase in production during the year of 24 eggs per bird.—Prairie Farmer.

Feather Picking

The taste of blood upon freshly-plucked quills is probably what keeps fowls picking at each other after something has started them. Letting them get away from each other by turning the flock out of doors is the most certain method of stopping the practice. Tar may be daubed upon any bleeding point about the comb or head to discourage the attackers. Bleeding follows any injury that breaks the skin, it may be from accident or attacks.—Rural New Yorker.

Let Sun Shine In

On warm days the fronts of poultry houses should be thrown open so that the sunlight may get into the house and on the birds. It will help keep the flock strong and healthy in addition to keeping the house dry. Sunlight not only aids in improving the health of the flock, but also tends to increase laying and to improve the shell strength of eggs, states E. W. Henderson, Iowa State college. Soft-shelled eggs often result from insufficient sunlight.

Lizards Feast Royally on Eggs of Crocodile

I have sometimes watched monitors, or African water lizards, at their work of robbing crocodile nests of their eggs, C. R. S. Pitman writes, in Asia Magazine. The antics of these prehistoric looking creatures, which are usually about four feet long, are most entertaining.

On more than one occasion when I have been lying in concealment, observing the behavior of the guardian females on the breeding grounds, I have seen a monitor deliberately provoke a crocodile until it rushes off in pursuit into the water. In the meantime the monitor's mate arrives on the scene, excavates the nest with great haste and begins gobbling up the eggs.

Soon it is joined by No. 1, which had only taken to the water as a ruse. They usually succeed in disposing of the greater portion of the eggs before the return of the rightful owner. Even when forced to withdraw, they will decamp each with an egg in its mouth.

Life Expectancy

The average life expectancy at birth in this country is 56.42 years, this figure being based on the 1920 United States census for the whole population. For males the figure is 55.33 and for females, 57.52.

The DAIRY

LOWER PRICES IN SURPLUS OF COWS

New York Dairy Official Is Pessimistic.

"If we do not have another drought this summer, the manufacture of dairy products will increase, and thus lower the farmers' return," said H. A. Ross, of the Borden company, at Cornell university's farm and home week. "The farmer has not heeded the trend in the supply of cows and today is facing the situation of having 11.8 per cent mors cows than in 1929."

Doctor Ross predicts, however, no material reduction in the number of cows, and perhaps even a slight increase. "I cannot blame the farmer for not cutting his herd," he said, "because of the overhead expenses and the lowered cost of feed. But the situation today is serious. Butter is now going into storage rather than being drawn from storage."

Many people seem to think that with the present lowered prices, demand will increase. Doctor Ross indicated, however, that such might not be the case. He estimates that the buying power of the people is about one-half of that in 1929. This is due to both the unemployment situation and decreased wages of those who are working.

In New York state the farmers are facing the situation of store sales of milk as contrasted with route sales. If more milk is sold in stores, the farmer will receive less for his investment. He said that the basic situation could not be remedied now but that the farmer could help by culling his herd and aiding the control of store sales.

Ration That "Fills Bill" in Variety of Proteins

Since some proteins are particularly rich in some amino acids while others may furnish more of some others, one protein may supplement another. We know that every feed a cow eats, whether roughage or grain, contains some protein and different proteins.

It has been shown that the protein of alfalfa or legume hays supplements those of silage and grains. The protein of the high protein feeds supplement those of the grains. There is little supplementary value between the cereal grains.

From this an Iowa experiment concludes that where a cow is getting a ration consisting of plenty of legume hay, silage, and a grain mixture of 10-12 per cent digestible protein, her demand for protein variety is fairly well met. With mixed hay, the grain mixture should contain from 14 to 16 per cent digestible protein, while with non-legume hay it should contain 16 to 20 per cent digestible protein.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Why Milk Tests Vary

Milk tests vary from day to day due to perfectly normal factors, state specialists at New York State college, who have tested samples of Holstein and Jersey milk to determine effects of sampling on fat tests. Some of the factors are: Advancement of the lactation period of the cows, which means more fat in the milk; the amount of exercise the herd receives; completeness of milking; feeding practices; age of the cows; the breed; individual difference of the cows; the seasonal changes with higher tests when the temperatures are low and lower tests when temperatures are high during the heat of summer. In New York state two testers working independently will check within 0.1 per cent in 60 per cent of the samples they test. The Babcock test is not expected to give greater accuracy than this.

Methods of sampling have been held responsible for daily variations, and the recent investigation indicates the reasons why tests may vary even though all sampling is done uniformly. —Prairie Farmer.

Keeping Calves Healthy

Dirty feeding pails are often the contributing cause of an outbreak of common scours in calves. Avoid this by scalding the pails after each feeding. Allow the sun to shine on them during the day. Some dairymen keep a separate pail for each calf. Overfeeding is another frequent cause of scours. Feed around one pound of milk for each ten pounds of live weight, and during the first few days give the calf several feeds per day. The milk fed can be gradually increased with growth until the animal is getting around two to two and one-half gallons of skim milk per day. Begin giving the calf some ground grain or other concentrate as soon as it will eat.—Wallace's Farmer.

Tests for Mastitis

Tests for the presence of mastitis in dairy cows was one of a number of features of an exhibit at a group of dairy meetings held in Syracuse, N. Y., This exhibit was prepared by the experiment station and the college of agriculture, and was of much interest to the various cattle breed associations, as well as to the State Dairymen's association. Mastitis has long been a baffling malady in dairy herds and much attention is being given to its detection and treatment.—Exchange.

FLYER BROUGHT TO DEATH BY SEAGULL

Untimely Fate of Early Air Navigator.

The two and three thousand mile non-stop flights which are undertaken by flyers in these days with little thought given to the mechanical difficulties which might arise contrast strangely with the first really long-distance flight in this country a little more than 20 years ago.

History was made when Cal Rogers, advertising a beverage known as Vin Fizz, left Mineola on his epoch flight to the Pacific coast. The preparations for his flight were not so simple as the loading up of the plane with sufficient gas and oil and the preparation of a little lunch to sustain the airman during his long flight.

There were no mapped out air routes, no radio weather reports, no emergency landing fields, no spare parts to be picked up en route at some airport if it should prove necessary to replace some failing piece of equipment and if something went wrong high up in the air there was no parachute to let him safely down to earth.

His plans were far more intricate. To answer the problem of a route, he chose various rail lines as his route and he flew a meandering route as the trains meandered. His landing fields were indicated to him, not by beacons, but by the crowds waiting below to see him land. It was usually the circus field which was chosen. He had no need for advance weather reports, for his daily flights hardly carried him from one weather zone into another. The problem of spare parts was answered by a baggage car which accompanied him along the rail line carrying enough parts to build an entire plane.

When all was set for the start of his historic flight, he hopped off from Mineola for Middletown, N. Y., the tremendous distance of 70 miles away. He came through about on schedule and was greeted uproariously by a crowd that marveled at the distance flown in a single day. Waiting for him in Middletown was a purse raised among the excited citizens, who felt their city highly honored that it should be chosen as the starting place of the historic flight.

Having reached Middletown, Rogers decided that he had done his quota of flying for that day, and stayed overnight. The next morning after several hours of preparation while the impatient crowd waited to see its first take-off, the Vin Fizz flyer finally taxied down the field and started. Insufficient speed, however, prevented him from attaining the necessary altitude to clean some trees bordering the field and in dodging them he struck a telephone wire that nosed his plane over. Fortunately Rogers escaped with only a few bruises, and the repairs to his plane were relatively simple and he was able to leave on the following day.

Two months of flying finally brought him to the coast, where he was received with great enthusiasm. While in San Francisco he gave a number of exhibition flights, on one of which he met his death. A seagull, running afoul the plane, became wedged in one of the wires of his rudder and the plane nosed down into the bay, taking the life of the man who had survived what were then considered the almost impossible hazards of flying clear across the country.

White Indians Found

A Harvard museum explorer has confirmed the long reported existence of white Indians in South America. Returning from an expedition during which he penetrated the alternate arid and jungle country of northeastern Paraguay, Dr. Donald S. Wees, of that institution, reports the finding of white Indians with blond hair living in both the jungle and Grand desert like wild animals. He says they do not have clothes, shelters or traps of any kind. The bow and arrow is their chief weapon. They were so shy and wild he couldn't even get a picture of them.

On the "Glorious Fourth"

Great American events celebrated on the Fourth of July would include the birth of such men as Nathaniel Hawthorne, Giuseppe Garibaldi, Stephen Collins Foster, Joseph Pennell and Calvin Coolidge, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Monroe died on the Fourth of July. The corner stone of the Washington monument was laid July 4, 1848; work was commenced on the Erie canal, 1817; the surrender of Vicksburg occurred July 4, 1863; Providence, R. I., was founded by Roger Williams, 1636.

in the coldest part of the refrigerator. Cuts of meat should be placed in a clean, dry uncovered dish. Cooked meat can be stored best if loosely wrapped or covered to prevent drying.

Moist cooked food needs careful handling or thorough heating before serving a second time to safeguard against serious food poisoning. Without a refrigerator, the safest rule is to cook only enough for one meal, avoiding left-overs as far as possible.

HELENA HAPPENINGS

BIG LEAGUE TEAMS NOW SETTLING DOWN TO STEADY STRIDES

Memphis And Chattanooga Staging Battle Royal For Leadership In Southern League

With the baseball season half over the big league teams are settling down to a steady pace. The teams that were rated the second division berths are gradually slipping from their places at the top of the league and in general those teams that were showing the greatest strength on paper at the first of the season are hitting their stride and gradually coming to the front.

Within the past two weeks the National league has been watching the Pittsburgh Pirates work their way up to the head of the league. Just how long they will stay there is a mystery, but if they continue to hit and get the pitching that they have been getting from their players they should give the other clubs plenty of worry for the rest of the season.

The Boston Braves who were rated a weak team in both offensive and defensive department of the game are running in third place, two games behind the second place Cubs. The experts failed to judge the new material on the Braves roster at its correct value, and these new men have raised the team from a poor second division berth to a tie for first honors in the fielding averages and a strong fourth in the batting averages.

The fourth first division team is the World Champion Cardinals. For some reason they have failed to click with championship precision this season. Manager Gabby Street was not long in finding out that something was radically wrong with his charges and immediatey began to trade. When asked if he was planning on getting a winning combination together for a final dash for pennant he said that he was looking forward to next season and introducing new blood in preparation for 1933.

In the second division of the National league Philadelphia, Brooklyn, New York and Cincinnati are all striving to keep out of the cellar. Cincinnati and the Giants still have a weakness for faling into it most of the time, while the Phillies and the Dodgers fight it out for fifth place. The race is close throughout the second division however as there is only a difference of three games between the fifth and eighth place teams.

Three new managers appear on the club rosters this season. Max Carey replaced Wilbert Robinson in Brooklyn, Jewel Ens of the Pirates was replaced by George Gibson. Both of these appointments were made during the winter months.

In May a bombshell broke in the ranks of the league. John McCraw, Giant pilot for thirty two years resigned, second only to Connie Mack of the Philadelphia Athletics in years of service. McCraw was the most consistant pennant winner in the history of organized baseball. During his regime he had his teams in the first division twenty eight times and won nine pennants. Ill health was given as the reason for his retirement. Bill Terry, the Giants hard-boiled outfielder, was appointed to take McCraw's place.

In the American league things have been working out according to preseason predictions. The Yankees have held onto the sun berth since the first weeks of the season. The Athletics, last year's pennant winners, are running 2nd. but haven't so far shown the drive to win consistently enough to threaten the Yanks.

Experts are fearing that the Yanks race due for a fall however. Any team that goes along as they have for the first half of the season without suffering a single slump are about due for one. At the present time they are hampered by the loss of Bill Dickey, star catcher. Dickey was suspended for a month on the fourth of July after an altercation with Reynolds, Washington outfielder .

Spirit ran so high in the Dickey matter that Col. Rupert called a special meeting last Saturday to thrash the matter out. The suspension stood, and the solons went so far as to vote that the minimum suspension for fighting on the diamond hereafter would be a thirty day lay off. Pitchers who attempt to scare a batter from the plate by throwing the "bean ball' at his head will also be suspended for an undetermined period, according to the new rules.

In the Southern league, Memphis and Chattanooga are staging a battle royal for the leadership. The Chicks were having plenty of trouble until they hit a lucky streak two weeks ago and took three out of four from the Lookouts. But Chattanooga is not through fighting and is trying to even matters up in their four-game series with Memphis.

The Birmingham Barons, are showing anything but the championship calibre that they had last year. Their pitchers have been pounded all over the lot and the ambulance has been about the only car that the players had any use for. On paper it is hard to see why they should be down in the second division. At present they are batting for a club average of .291 against their season average .297 last year, and their fielding average of .966 is only four points shy of last year's average. If memory serves us correctly, the Barons won the pennant by a late season dash. If they can get their men out of the hospital in time they may give the leaders a run for the flag this year..

Baseball as a whole has been suffering from non-attendance. Majors and Minors alike have resorted to synthetic double headers to attract the crowds. The minor leagues are especially hard hit. The Cotton States League has failed to get a loan of $7,500 to keep going for the remainder of the season and has decided to wind up its season this week. Reports from other sections of the country state that the Central, Eastern and Three I leagues may follow unless the major leagues can come to their rescue.

FARM NEWS BRIEFS

The Department of Labor estimates the number of unemployed at 10,634. The department of Labor index of employment for May was 59.7 against 62.2 for April and 75.2, May, 1932. Its indexes for payroll totals for the same months are 42.5, 44.7, and 67.7. The basis for comparison is 100 as the 12-month average of 1926.

Home economics specialists at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute say that good-looking hair and skin and a pleasing appearance are built upon cleanliness, a well-balanced diet, and observance of good habits as to health. They emphasize cleanliness, suggesting that the hair should be washed at least once a week and perhaps oftener.

"A good bag for making jelly can be made of a yard of 36-inch medium-weight cotton flannel and a half-yard of strong linen tape. The finished bag should be about 13 inches wide and 15 inches deep. It does not pay to skimp on the cloth for draining jelly."—Bess Fleming, Auburn, Ala.

The unemployment situation has proved a boon to unprincipled promoters selling mushroom spawn, says the Bureau of Plant Industry, U. S. Department of Agriculture, in a warning issued today. Promoters claim much and promise more but their claims are for the most part misleading and their promises of little or value.

Although the Hawley-Smoot tariff law which was enacted early in the administration of President Hoover raised the duties on 655 products the present indications are that customs receipts for this year will be only a little more than one-half of what they were before this measure was enacted. The drop is due to the low level to which American foreign trade has declined.

Hand-wrapped individual bananas will soon made their appearance if plans now in the making are perfected. Growers in Sao Paulo banana section of Brazil are considering exports with the fruit wrapped in oiled paper, similar to the practice now followed for oranges. It is claimed that bananas keep perfectly for 45 days without refrigeration when this method is followed.

AROUND THE WORLD With COLUMBUS

Who is responsible for the taxes that are going into effect, and for the gigantic legislation that has been passed by our law-making bodies during the past several months. Who is to blame? Who is to be blamed for the largest and most important piece of legislation that has been passed in a long time; the measure that everyone in this country will feel before it is over; the measure deemed necssary to bring sufficient funds into the treasury to meet the expenditures already made or to be made this year? We'll tell you who's responsible for this biggest peace time tax measure ever passed. We, the people of this great United States are responsible. You would consider it indirectly, but when sifted to the bottom, we are found to be directly responsible. In place of going to the polls and voting heavy tax creators out of offices in which we know they have no place, we make feeble cries and protests, but do nothing about it as it seems that we have fallen into the habit of putting the same old crowd back term after term. Large sums of money have been appropriated to aid various activities, and whether Republicans or Democrats, the results will be claimed. You, the people of this great nation, want to know who is to be accredited with this measure that will effect you before long. Are you not largely to blame?

Judge Walter B. Jones, one of the foremost authorities in the state, and one of the judges of the Fifteenth Judicial Circuit, in commenting on this tax measure in relation to the "slack" voting that has taken and is taking place in this country, very forcefully and relevantly hit the nail on the head:

Honey crystallizeed by a new process keeps indefinitely when canned or packed in glass.

Radio telephone service has been established between France and Morocca, available for public calls.

A process has been developed for obtaining the fibre of New Zealand flax from the green leaf in 15 minutes.

Dishes fed into one side of a new electrically operated washing machine come out of the other clean and rinsed.

Electricity is now supplied to more than 98 per cent of the area of Belgium.

THIS WEEK IN POLITICS

By E. BASKIN WRIGHT

SAUCE FOR THE GANDER

The suggestions before the Imperial Economic Conference now in session at Ottawa should give Americans considerable food for thought. For years the United States has followed Henry Clay's "American System" of a high protective tariff and for years the United States has been able to get away with it.

Now there seems to be danger of the shoe being placed upon the other foot. There has never been any concerted action directed against the American tariff policy up to the present but such action seems now in prospect.

Canada has suggested to the Conference that in order to improve conditions within the Empire, a high protective tariff should be inaugurated with preference to be given the products of the members of the Empire.

Of course such action would not be uniform because there is no legislative assembly for the British Empire. The only link holding the parts together is the monarchy and the "Union Jack".

However, Canada proposes that each dominion take independent action along with the Mother Country and attempt, by such action, to promote better trade relationships among the component parts. Such action whether aimed at the United States or not would seriously damage American trade.

The nations forming the British Commonwealth of Nations are so different in climate, natural resources, and industries that each is able to supply many of the products and manufactured goods to the others. Many of these goods are now supplied by the United States. For example, last year the United States supplied to Canada about two-thirds of the anthracite coal used in the Dominion with Wales supplying the other third. If the Canadian plan should go into operation, in all probability, this would be reversed with the possibility that America would lose practically the whole market

No thoughtful American can blame the States of the British Empire from taking this action, if they do. We have no patent rights on a tariff system but this proposal by Canada illustrates clearly the warning issued by the Democratic Party not to go too far with the tariff. The Hawley-Smoot tariff went too far and now we are in a fair way to reap the deluge.

THOSE PESKY IRISH

What it is about an Irishman that makes him pugnacious nobody knows. The fact remains, however, that he is pugnacious and independent.

For years and even centuries Ireland has been a problem to England. At times the trouble has subsided but it always flares up again.

The election of Eamon de Valera as President of the Irish Free State to replace conservative President William Thomas Cosgrave was the signal for more trouble. Englishmen had sighed with relief when Ireland was given Dominion status by the Lloyd George Government in 1921. That seemed to settle the Irish question once and for all.

Such, however, was not the case with radical De Valera and his Sinn Fein Party. Nothing but independence would satisfy them. Now, with DeValera in power, the Irish are on the loose again. First, DeValera redeemed a campaign pledge by securing the passage thru the Irish Chamber of Deputies (Dail Eireann) a bill abolishing the oath of allegance to the English king which is required of all Irish officials. This bill has not passed the Irish Senate (Seanad Eireann) but the Irish Constitution provides that if a bill passes the Dail and is defeated by the Senate it may be passed again after eighteen months by the Dail and become a law without the concurrence of the Senate. So this fight has been merely delayed.

The immediate trouble is the refusal of the Irish Government to

WOMAN'S CLUB WORK REPORT SHOWS MUCH PROGRESS DURING '32

Members Cooperate With Miss Carroll, Director, To Bring About Domestic Economy

Much credit is due Miss Jessie Mae Carroll, county home demonstration worker, for her efficient organization and work in Shelby County. With the help of the women of Shelby county she has organized 34 clubs, with 512 women and 590 girls enrolled, making a total of 1102 club members.

The writer chatting with Mrs. Walter Chancellor, secretary of the club work, heard of the work of these interesting members and of what they were aclomplishing. Mrs. Chtancellor said: "We have studied clothing as a major subject this year. Some of the subjects we have studied were, dyeing, stain removal, remodelling old clothes, care of clothes and commercial and home-made foundation garments. Monthly reports show that we have dry cleaned at home some 800 garments at a saving of $376.00. 397 garments have been dyed, the majority of them being made from feed sacks. 442 women have reported remodelling old clothes.

The 4-H Club Girls of the Company have made 588 garments in their clothing propects this year. We also have 30 girls carrying poultry projects with over 6,000 chicks.

"Aside from our clothing program of work, we have been receiving instructions every month in canning. The women are more interested than ever before in canning vegetables. Reports show that within the last two months 18,000 jars have been canned."

GOVERNMENT ENACTS NEW LABELING SYSTEM TO PROTECT CONSUMER

Labels To Indicate Whether Product Is Standard Or Of Inferior Quality Of Food

Uncle Sam has taken another step toward making it easier for the house wife to get the most for her money when she buys canned foods.

During the last year, purchasers have seen a new wording printed in bold faced type upon labels of some canner peas, peaches, pears, tomatoes, cherries, and apricots. That legend, "Below U. S. Standard, Low Quality But Not Illegal" has appeared upon the labels of the canned foods mentioned which fell below official standards of quality set up by the secretary of Agriculture.

After August 23, there are going to be some changes in this labelling on sub-standard goods. The sub-standard now in effect, "Below U. S. Standard, Low Quality but Not Illegal", has not been changed so far as substandard canned vegetables are concerned, Sub-standard canned fruits, however, well labelled, "Below U. S. Standard, Good Food, Not High Grade".

Under the new regulations the house wife is further protected again buying slack filled cans. In case the contents fall below the standard of fill, the goods must be labeled with the statement, "Below U. S. Standard, Slack Filled." This regulation goes into effect August 23.

The presence of the statement declaring canned goods to be of substandard quality is not interpreted by officials of the Department of Agriculture as stigmatizing the foods. Department officials do believe, however, that a substandard article should sell for a lower price than goods which are of higher quality.

CHELSEA ROAD SURVEYED

The road to Chelsea is now being surveyed under the direction of Jack Burleson. When completed, it is hoped that work will begin on the construction of this new road which will connect Columbiana with the new Birmingham Highway.

Those assisting Mr. Burleson in this project are: James Taylor, Jesse Weldon, James Leonard and James Davis.

DR. J. M. KIMMEY IS DIRECTOR OF SCOUT CAMP AT LAKE

The Boy Scouts, recently organized by Dr. J. M. Kimmey left for Lake Jackson for their summer camp Friday.

We may all retire and take a back seat but the jaunty, young Americanos will "carry on"—hot weather or not. So think Dr. Kimmey and W. W. Wallace, who spent the night at this camping retreat on Friday night. From all the writer can gather, "sleep" had been entirely left out of these campers regulations and the night was made merry with many bon fires and Indian war whoops interspersed with all the pranks these over inventive minds could conjure up. However, Troup No. L. is a very enthusiastic and energetic group of boys and among their plans for the summer activities is the improvement of the Presbyterian Church Lawn, which they hope to convert into a play ground.

The boys are deeply indebted to the American Legion Post of Shelby County who donated the tents and cots which enabled them to complete their camping plans for the summer.

DEEP SEA RODEO TO BE HELD ON MOBILE BAY AUGUST 8, 9, 10

Commissioner I. T. Quinn Expresses Belief That Rodeo Will Be Most Successful Held At Mobile

Preparations are nearing completion for Alabama's Fourth Annual Deep Sea Fishing Rodeo to be held in lower Mobile Bay and the Alabama Gulf Waters August 8, 9, and 10, according to Commissioner I. T. Quinn, of the Department of Game and Fisheries.

Continuing, Commissioner said: "The Fourth Annual Deep Set Fishing Rodeo promises to surpass any event of its kind ever held. Registrations of participants are being received daily at the office of Secretary Sam H. Lackland, Adams Motor Company, at 350 Government Street, Mobile.

Fishing sportsmen from all over Alabama and from the far flung sections of the country will meet at Fort Gaines and match their fishermen's prowess with their competitors. Among the notables who are expected to participate are Will Rogers, of Beverly Hills, California; U. S. Senator Harry B. Hawes, author of "My Friend the Black Bass', Missouri; Colenel Charles Dawes, with a party of fifty from Chicago, Ill., and Irvin S. Cobb, of New York City.

SHELBY CO. FARM LOAN ASSOCIATION HOLD MEETING IN IN COURTHOUSE SATURDAY

Prominent Farmers of Shelby County were in session in Columbiana Saturday, at the Court House. President J. W. Heflin is in charge of the organization. Mr. Roy dyer, secretary, had a number of delinquent claims up for adjustment and that which could not be immediately disposed of, were referred to a Committee to work out some definite plan that would be satisfactory to both the Farmer and the Federal Farm Loan Bank.

REV. D. Z. WOOLEY'S CAR CAPSIZES ON WILSONVILLE ROAD

Rev. D. Z. Wooley was painfully hurt when his car ran off the Wilsonville Highway Thursday. His young son, Andrew was driving and, when nearing the Henry Templin place, lost control of the wheel and the car capsized.

MORE TRENCH SILOS

Columbiana.—More trench silos will be used next winter by Shelby County farmers, according to County Agent A. A. Lauderdale. Eight farmers made silos last year and these have served as successful demonstrations. Silage crop have been planted and are now growing.

Evergreen, Ala.—Daily sales of poultry and eggs are being made through the Conecuh County farm bureau. Cream and corn meal have been handled also. June sales of these products totaled $2563.16. While the farm bueau is selling, County Agent P. R. Pettis is directing production.

FLOREY, PROMINENT SHELBY COUNTIAN, PASSES AT VINCENT

Funeral Services For Well-Known Teacher Held At Vincent Baptist Church Thursday

C. H. Florey, prominent citizen of Shelby County, passed away at his home in Vincent, July 20, 1932. Mr. Florey was born in Harpersville, June 2, 1860. He received his education at Howard College, graduating with honors and an A.B. Degree in 1887. Howard College was located at this time in Marion, Alabama.

Immediately upon leaving college, he began teaching in Monroe, Choctaw and Marengo Counties, returning to Shelby County in 1909, where he became prominently identified with the schools of this county. He was elected principal of the schools in Vincent and Harpersville where he taught for a number of years. He was a devout member of the Baptist Church for 60 years, and an ordained deacon for 25 years. He was elected a member of the Board of Revenue of Shelby County and served for four years in this capacity. He was also an influential leader in the movement that resulted in the incorporation of the town of Vincent. "Prof. Florey," as he was affectionately known to thousands, rejected many offers from various Colleges in the South, preferring to spend his life teaching in the rural schools of his own county.

Funeral services were conducted from the Baptist Church in Vincent, Thursday morning, Rev. G. E. Franks officiating, assisted by Dr. J. M. Thomas, Pastor of the First Baptist church of Talladega and a former class-mate of the deceased.

Mr. Florey was a useful citizen, active in church and counhty affairs; his memory will live on in the hearts of his former friends, pupils and associates.

He is survived by his widow, one daughter, Mrs. Dick McGraw, of Vincent, and one son, Carter Florey, Four brothers, W. J. Florey, E. E. Florey, Vincent; Joe Florey, Birmingham, and Charlie Florey, Perdue Hill, Alabama; two sisters, Mrs. Will Agee, Birmingham and Mrs. Minnie Tucker, Talladega.

The Democrat extends sympathy.

GENERAL AIR EXPRESS NATIONWIDE NETWORK TO BEGIN OPERATIONS

For First Time In Aviation Waybills Permit Free Exchange Of Airline Merchandise

Arrangements were completed Wednesday for the inauguration on August 1st of a nation-wide Interline Airway Express System, with connections to Canada, Mexico and South America, according to an announcement made by General George S. Gibbs, President of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, after a conference in New York with representatives of seven leading air lines.

The new express network will be known has "General Air Express," operating over the American Airways Inc., Trans Continental & Western Air, Inc., Eastern Air Transport, Inc., Trans American Airlines Corporation, United States Airways, Inc., Pennsylvania Airlines, Inc., and Ludington Airlines. It is expected and understood that Northwest Airways, Inc., and Pan-American Airways, Inc. will join this group shortly.

For the first time in the history of aviation a uniform waybill has been adopted to permit the free exchange of merchandise from one airline to another at connecting terminals, and through rates will be quoted between 138 cities directly served in this new air shipping development.

The American Airways, Inc., which is flying planes through Tuscaloosa daily is among the group forming this new combine. It is understood, that while the planes flying through Tuskaloosa do not stop at the present, unless for refueling, it is hoped that enough business can be built up at this point that will justify this express service for Tuskaloosa if the merchants desire faster deliveries.

Shipments can be made by Gener-

DEMOCRAT ANNOUNCES TIPTON AS NEW MANAGING EDITOR

The Democrat takes pleasure in announcing the addition of Laurence B. Tipton to its staff. He assumed the duties of managing editor of the Democrat last week, occupying the place formerly held by Walter D. Samuel, Jr.

Mr. Tipton graduated from the University of Alabama last year in journalism. He worked during his spare time, while in attendance at the University, with the Tuskaloosa Warrior, and is well qualified for his new post.

"Tip," as we know him, comes from one of the old line Democratic, Alabama black-belt families. His family has lived in and around Dallas County for several generations.

We are sure that the people of Shelby county will receive him with the best of feelings and confidence, and at the same time we have no hesitancy in believing that he will render the people of Shelby County that service which is expected of a man of his calibre.

CANDLING REGULATION BY STATE DEPARTMENT PROTECTS EGG SUPPLY

Failure To Comply Constitutes Misdemeanor Punishable By $10 To $50 Fine

Enforcement of the egg testing or candling regulation of the State Board of Agriculture, to insure a better egg supply, is to be rigidly carried out with Agents from the Department of Agriculture making frequent tests of grocery store eggs to determine whether there are any failures to comply.

The rules and regulations relating to eggs make it a misdemeanor punishable with a fine of not less than $10 and not more than $50.00 for a person to fail to comply with the candling provisions, if convicted. The provision is made also that permission to sell eggs for the period of one year will be revoked for subsequent offenses.

Grocery stores and other places handling eggs must certify that they have been candled, by which means mouldy, bad eggs which have been incubated for a period of five days or more can be discovered. The process of candling is simple, and requires only a dark corner or space, with a bright light placed within, before which each egg is passed to determine its freshness.

Eggs that are shipped must be candled also, and certified.

MONTEVALLO THEATRE TO CLOSE FOR FIVE WEEKS

Eddie Watson, manager of the Strand Theatre in Montevallo, states that the Theatre will be closed after Saturday night for a period of five weeks, reopening about September 1st. Shelby County is fortunate in having a picture show of this kind. Only first-run pictures are shown and many times are presented before the larger cities run them. This is one of a very few of the smaller show houses that have weathered the recent depression and it is hoped that the Fall will spell better business conditions for everyone.

NEW USE FOR COTTON SEEN IN NOVEL RUG STORAGE BAG

Storage bags for the protection of fine rugs against damage by moths is a newly developed use for cotton which is reported to be meeting with popular favor in retail stores, according to the Bureau's Textile Division.

These cylindrical bags for use by the consumer in storing rugs at home are made of canvas and have handy slip fasteners. The cotton fabric, which is chemically treated to repel moths, is said to protect clean rugs indefinitely from pests. These bags are equipped with straps so that they may be conveniently swung from attic rafters or hung up in other storage places.

FARM GET-TO-GETHER MEETING DRAWS TWO THOUSAND CITIZENS

Representative Oliver, Clabaugh, Lyle, Lowery, Ramsay, Among Speakers On Program

LARGEST CROWD EVER TO ASSEMBLE IN SHELBY CO.

Speakers Urge Farmers To Adopt Optimistic Outlook During Trying Times

More than 2,000 Shelby County citizens answered the challenging call for a "get-to-gether" meeting at Jackson Lake on last Thursday. Mr. A. A. Lauderdale, popular and efficient Farm Demonstration Agent was in charge of the arrangements for the entertainment of the guests and congratulations are in order for his untiring efforts in bringing together the largest crowd ever assembled for an occasion of this kind and to his co-laborers, for making the meeting one of the most interesting from every standpoint as well as most instructive.

A group like this is wonderfully inspirational, representing as it does every part of Shelby County, the large number present indicated the interest in and the significance of the occasion. The purpose of the meeting seems to have been to bring a congenial group of people together with a common purpose, to know each other better, to know our work better, to plan for further development, and, incidentally, to have a good time.

Numbers of distinguished guests were presented, among them, Mr. J. C. Lowery, Agronomy Specialist, of Auburn, who made the opening address. Following this interesting talk was an out-standing speaker—J. L. Lyle, County Agent for Jefferson County. Spirited and eloquent was his plea for the Farmers, stressing the fact that the Farm and Farmers were the basis of all lasting prosperity. He urged those engaged in the occupation of Farming to plant corn, and to enrich the soil with vetch, stating that the latter formed a private nitrate plant which would insure rich soil for all their products Summing up his subject with the immortal words from Henry Grady's pen: "When every farmer in the South shall eat bread from his own fields and meat from his own pastures and, disturbed by no creditors and enslaved by no debt, shall sit down among his teeming gardens and orchards and vineyards and his dairies and his barnyards, pitching his crops in his own wisdom and growing them in independence, making cotton his clean surplus, and selling it in his own time in his chosen market and not at a master's bidding; getting his pay in cash and not in a receipted mortgage that discharges the debt but does not restore his freedom—then shall be breaking the fullness of our day" he struck the key note of the situation.

Sam Clabaugh, genial President of the Protective Life Insurance Company of Birmingham, made an informal talk and, with his gift for friendliness and happy faculty of perceiving the "silver lining" to the dark cloud of the recent depression, he made decidedly the most optimistic plea for the abolishment of all pessimistic views. "The chaotic state into which many have been plunged has brought about an inter-dependence and a friendliness and neighborliness that prosperity failed to find", he stated and on this happy note, with the assurance that "things could we worse", he received quite an ovation.

Other noted speakers were F. M. Jackson, Darius Thomas, President of the Chamber of Commerce in Birmingham, Erskine Ramsay, Birmingham capitalist and Sid Lee, also from Birmingham.

A style revue sponsored by the Home Demonstration Clubs of Shelby County in charge of Mrs. Walter Chancellor, proved one of the most interesting features of the day. Many lovely dresses were worn by the models who had made them from cotton sacks. Sweaters for sports costumes had been woven by hand and dyed in various colors to harmonize with the cotton dyed making stylish suits for all occasions.

RETIRED DETECTIVE SEES MANY CHANGES

Says New York Better City Than in Old Days.

New York.—The jewelry thefts and pickpocket rackets are slipping in New York. The old-time pennyweighter, whose trick of sustituting fake stones for good ones cost jewelers many a dollar in the good old days, has about disappeared. And the old school of pickpockets, many of whom were so proficient that they were hard to catch, have been succeeded by youthful thieves whose work is crude and amateurish by comparison.

"Bogus checks are the leading racket these days," according to former Detective Ernest L. Moore. "Banks, jewelers and stores are the victims of this type of confidence game, and the merchant is the most defenseless against it, for in most cases, rather than lose a sale, he will take a chance."

Mr. Moore has just retired from the police department after 25 years of service. Practically all of it was spent in the detective division, and on the Fifth avenue squad, the group of plain clothes men especially detailed to the midtown section to guard against confidence men and pickpockets.

"Fifth avenue today isn't the street it was when the Fifth avenue squad was formed," the old veteran crime chaser said. "For one thing, 75 per cent of the town's jewelry establishments are now located in the midtown area, and the safeguards have been greatly increased. If you are accustomed to thinking of Maiden lane as the center of New York's jewelry section, you are behind the times, for, with the exception of the silversmiths, most jewelers have moved up town to office suites.

"Then, too, most of the better known thieves no longer operate here, for dips and confidence men are known to the police, who pick them up on sight. The Baumes act, too, which sends a fourth felony offender to prison for life, has no doubt done much to scare away the pickpockets."

On Famous Cases.

Moore, who was born in Pennsylvania, joined the police department in 1907, and, with the exception of two years during the war, when he served as lieutenant in the navy, he has been continuously a member of the city's finest.

During his quarter of a century in the detective division he has worked on many famous cases, but a lifetime of keeping his own counsel makes it difficult to get him to reminisce. He is a slender, quiet looking individual, whom you'd take at first sight for a conservative business man. But one look from his penetrating blue eyes and you understand why a crimp was put in the crime racket during the years he operated on Fifth avenue between Forty-fourth and Forty-eighth streets.

Moore was chief arresting officer when the Gondorf brothers, Charles and Fred, who were called the wire tapping kings for their swindling operations, were started to Sing Sing.

With this arrest the hunco syndicate that embraced the United States, Canada, and England was broken up.

Hunt Lost Currency Buried Half Century

Fayette, Mich.—Summer in the upper peninsula of Michigan has again revived talk of renewing search for the buried wealth amassed by Alphonse Bellanguette, on the outskirts of Fayette, more than fifty years ago.

Bellanguette, a French-Canadian, came here in 1872 when Fayette was in its prime. He saw opportunity in the fact that the sale of liquor was prohibited in the town and set up a saloon on the beach, two miles away.

He prospered and did not believe in banks. His wife discovered that he had buried much of his fortune, but she could not find the hiding place. Regularly since then searchers have sought in vain for the treasure.

One advantage of voting for the loser is that one doesn't have to make apologies at the end of the term.

ARE YOU BUSY?

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Emeritus Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

So far as I can remember I have always been busy. If I am not doing something with my head, my hands are generally occupied. I have never known what it is when awake to sit or lie still with no occupation of any sort. What I do when asleep only those who watch over me are conversant with, but I imagine I'm restless if not talkative.

"Can't you sit still?" mother used to say to me when I was squirming about in church, not interested in the sermon, but trying to get my hands onto a hymn book or something else with which I might more agreeably occupy my attention.

Nelson comes into my office leaving a dozen people waiting outside to see me, and finds me with the desk piled high with the morning mail.

"Are you busy?" he asks.

Of course I am busy. I shouldn't be earning my salary if I were not, but I do not say so. I simply reply, "I'd be very glad to talk to you if you wish," and the letters lie unread before me.

I am comfortably seated in an easy chair before the wood fire after dinner. "With Lawrence in Arabia" is in my hand half read and holding my attention with the account of the adventures of that impossible man. I am tremendously busy, and I have no desire or intention of being disturbed. I never was busier in my life.

The bell rings and I go to the door. Jackson stands without, hesitant, embarrassed.

"Are you busy this evening?" he inquires.

"I'd like to talk to you a while if you are not."

Now what he really means is that he'd like to talk to me, no matter what I am doing.

If you want to make a good beginning with a man of complicated and varied duties, it is just as well not to begin either by asking him if he is in a good humor or busy. He's probably both, but if he isn't, it won't help matters to inquire.

CITY DWELLERS ARE GOING BACK TO FARM

Disillusioned Youths Return to Old Home Nest.

St. Louis, Mo.—Throughout the Middle West there is a steady back-to-the-farm trek of youths, who, a few years ago, sought fame and fortune in the cities, according to Wood Netherland, president of the Federal Land bank here.

Economic conditions have forced young men and women, who were drawn by the glamor of the city and its high wages, to return to the farm with a sad story to tell the home folks, Netherland said.

Elderly persons, who were intent on spending their last years surrounded by the comforts and conveniences incident to city life, have been shorn of their incomes and have returned to their former homes.

The present city farm movement is perhaps the broadest and most far-reaching in the history of the Middle West, Netherland believes. The tide, which for many years had been flowing to the city, began ebbing back to the farm more than a year ago, he said.

Since then, industrial workers, either definitely out of employment, or in prospect of a layoff, have joined the trek in constantly increasing number, records of the Federal Land bank show.

Many city people, realizing that farms may now be purchased for a fraction of the price asked a few years ago, have gone to the country with the idea of profiting by the present depressed land prices, he said. More than 40 per cent of the current farm sales are to city people, he added.

The movement, according to Netherland, results from the first instinct of man, self-preservation. Faced with hunger, or becoming a ward of charity, city dwellers are moving out where they get a plot of land upon which to raise food.

Ancient Game Unearthed at Ur of the Chaldees

London. — Archeological finds of great interest at Ur of the Chaldees have been reported here by C. Leonard Woolley of the British museum-University of Pennsylvania joint expedition.

One object dug up was a broken carved stone, part of a gaming board suitable for the playing of a game similar to "snakes and ladders," in which dice are used and which long has been popular in England. The game, Woolley thinks, continued in use for thousands of years after its invention. The find was made in a building dating from the Fourth century B. C.

Less than two feet beneath the present surface of the ground at Ur the party found a small bowl of polished soapstone decorated with five bulls carved in relief. The excavators believe that the bowl must have been at least 30 feet beneath the old surface. It dates from about 2400 B. C. when stone carving had reached its most advanced stage. Each bull has over its back an ear of barley, symbolizing the agricultural wealth of Mesopotamia. The bowl is the finest piece of carving yet secured at Ur and will be exhibited with the gaming board here.

Woolley, who is accompanied by his wife, will return to Ur in the autumn. He has previously dug up tangible evidence of the existence of the Babylonian cities and is in search of more treasures for the expedition.

Sheep's Longest Wool

There are many kinds of sheep but a breed known as the Merino has the longest wool. While the wool clipped from an average sheep weighs but three to eight pounds, as much as 30 pounds may be obtained from these. It is a native of Spain, but is also raised extensively in Australia.

"Feed-Savers" Not of Actual Value

Extravagant Claims Made by Sellers Seldom Justified.

By DR. H. H. MITCHELL, Chief in Animal Nutrition, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois—WNU Service.

Elaborate and mysterious commercial devices which are being sold to farmers for saving feed by pre-digesting or fermenting it are practically worthless.

If a farmer accepts the extravagant claims made for the pre-digestion or fermentation of feeds by these high-priced, secret-formula mixtures, he does so simply because it is easier to believe than to investigate, especially if it is a case of believing what he hopes may be true.

It is true that one-half or more of the total nutrients in good farm rations are wasted by the animal, either as indigestible material or as extra animal heat, but the devices which are being offered the farmer haven't yet solved the problem of reducing this wastage. Nutrition laboratories have tested many methods of preparing feeds. While improvements can be made in producing a more complete digestion, the extra labor and expense involved have in most cases more than offset the increased digestibility, obtained.

Elaborate equipment is being sold for the pre-digestion of feed for horses and cattle. The use of this equipment is claimed to make enormous savings in feed bills. The feed is thoroughly soaked with water and mixed with a mysterious "converter," which in 24 hours or more will, it is claimed, render the feed much more digestible. Nor has the inefficient pig been overlooked by the manufacturers of these devices. A number of mixtures are on the market which, when mixed with ground raisins or even oat hulls and water and allowed to steep for several hours, will, it is claimed, ferment the feed and make it much more digestible. In the former case the "converter" is said to contain enzymes which do the work, while in the latter case, the fermentation is brought about by yeasts.

Unfortunately, neither the "converters" nor the yeasts can attack the indigestible woody material which is the main cause of feed wastage. If these agents produce any considerable chemical change, it is simply a change in the starches and sugars of the feed, which the animal itself has no difficulty in digesting.

Not Advisable to Plant Sudan Grass Too Early

Many inquiries with regard to the use of Sudan grass are received during the year, says a writer in the Rural New-Yorker. This is an annual grass of nutritious quality, making a large bulk of feed. One of the greatest mistakes northern farmers are likely to make is in planting it too early. Sudan grass is a near relative of the cultivated sorghums, and like them, does not germinate well in cold soil. Planted too early, the stand is likely to be thin and the early growth slow. Nothing is gained by seeding Sudan before the soil becomes thoroughly warm. In most of the northern states this is not until the middle of May or later. Sudan grass will not be ready to cut for hay or to be used as pasture any sooner if it is seeded in a cold soil than it will be if the seeding is delayed until the soil becomes warm or two or three weeks later. To delay seeding until two weeks after the beginning of corn planting is a safe precaution. The seed weighs about 40 pounds per bushel. Broadcast, 18 to 20 pounds per acre are needed. In drills, 6 pounds will be sufficient.

Concrete Mulch

The federal Department of Agriculture has been conducting experiments with permanent mulches of concrete, iron, cinders, zinc, aluminum and other substances which cover the ground except spots where plants are to grow. In the tests beans, peas, strawberries and other small fruit grew as well as with ordinary cultivation. Soils so covered since 1928 have continued productive. It is said that permanent mulch conserves moisture, controls weeds and warms the soil early.

Drags in Small Stacks

These are suggestions made by R. B. Popes, Monona county, Iowa, in Wallace's Farmer:

In order to speed up the hay-making and to save labor at such a busy time, we stack the hay in the field on a pole sled framework. By using buck rakes and a sweep stacker, it takes very little time to put the hay into a stack. Each sled will hold four or five tons. Then, in the winter, drag the small haystacks to the feed yard just as you pull a load on a wagon.

Plant Disease-Free Potatoes

The value of any potato for seed purposes depends upon its freedom from diseases such as spindle-tuber, mosaic, etc. Ordinarily seed which is certified by any responsible agency has a very low disease content and because of this is of superior value for seed purposes. Experiments have indicated that where the disease factor can be eliminated, just as valuable seed can be produced under irrigation as under any other cultural conditions. —Nebraska Farmer.

IDEAL PRISON NOW BEING ERECTED IN CALIFORNIA

One Hundred And Twenty Women Prisoners Will Be Housed In Penal Institution

The California institute for women, soon to be opened at Tehachapi, in southern California, will be a prison ideal for inmates. There will be no walls surrounding the institution, no scowling guards, and no omnipresent bars. However, chance for escape will be remote for a most elaborate lighting and telephone communication between farm overseers and cottage matrons will keep the inmates in close touch with officials

The institution, witht model cottages, will be a normal agricultural community, with only three men present. The women convicts will raise the products necessary for their own use and will attempt, after they have become settled, to raise enough produce on the 1360-acre fertile farm to help the food problem at the prison in San Quentin.

SEVEN THOUSAND BOYS GO ON COUNTY 4-H CAMPS

Boys Attending Represent Approximately One-Half Of The Total 4-H Clubs Enrollments

Seven thousand Alabama farm boys who are members of 4-H clubs are now thrilled about summer camps. With their county agent in charge these boys will spend two or three days in county camps at sites selected for beauty, for nearness to water, for comfort, and for recreation. Two of these county camps were held in June. The first was the Lowndes County camp; and the second the Randolph County camp, at Spring Villa near Opelika.

The schedule for June was Tuskaloosa and Pickens, 5-7; Coosa and West Tallapoosa, 7-9; Hale, 7-8; Bullock, 11-13; Winston, 11-12; Cherokee, 13-15; Elmore, 13-1*; Lamar, 14-15; Lee, 14-16; Baldwin, 14-16; Crenshaw, 14-15; Clarke, 20-21; Lawrence, 21-23; Etowah, 25-30.

Other camps will be held during July and August, according to Thomas A. Sims, State club leader at Auburn.

These 7,000 boys represent approximately one-half of the total Alabama enrollment in 4-H clubs for boys. While in camp boys enjoy recreation, information, social contact, and an outing.

The general program provides for a bugle call at 6:00 o'clock in the morning followed by a roll call then n swim before a delicious breakfast. Eight to 9:00 o'clock is given to instruction; and the next two hours to playing . The hour 11:00 to 12:00 o'clock is given to talks by local business and professional men with the dinner hour from 12:00 to 1:00.

The afternoons are spent in rest, recreation, and swimming. Vesper services are held in the early evening, followed by a 4-H club program and "taps" at 10:00 o'clock at night, thereby completing a busy day.

RAMBLING REMARKS

By
The Rambler

Looks like times are going to get better by Hoover signing the relief bill and turning loose some money. Even though it is a political move it will help things out and Alabama will come in for her share of the cash.

Even fool automobile drivers are valuable and have a little worth little as we might expect for they make employment for mechanics.

Within the past few months it has been very noticeable in cafes that there is no scramble for the dinner check. The idea is to let the other fellow pay if possible.

Now a day one can see rich men repairing their screen doors, mowing lawns, and driving their own automobiles without getting a scandal started.

Where gold diggers once demanded a dinner with many courses they are now well satisfied with a cold drink and a hot dog. Happy days are here again for the young man with his small income.

Even the clothing houses try to sell you a five dollar suit whereas they formerly turned up their nose if you even wanted to look at a suit under fifty without two pair of pants.

Don't look down on the slow man. The lightning bug travels very slowly but always winds up with a brilliant end.

When it gets so hot negroes pass out from the heat it is sure getting hot. Well only this past week several have died in Alabama from the heat and were not sick before they had too much of the free heat.

How can you sell folks if you don't tell 'em you have the stuff for sale. Advertise and get some of the money that is going to be spent for the necessities of life.

Nobody has any money to send so there is no need of increasing the money order rate. We believe the increase in postal rates will not cause greater flow of funds for companies are distributing their monthly statements and the boys and girls are writing fewer letters.

MISS CLARICE EVANS ENTERTAINS FOR MISSES CHAPMAN AT DELIGHTFUL LAWN PARTY

One of the most delightful social courtesies planned honoring the popular guests of Miss Clarice Evans, Miss Katy Lou and Helen Chapman, of Dadeville, was the lawn party givfor them on Tuesday night at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Taylor.

The lawn was artistically decorated and lighted with Japanese lanterns forming a beautiful setting for the games, contests and "date exchanges" the guests enjoyed.

About eleven o'clock ice cold water melons were cut and served to the following guests: Misses Helen and Katy Lou Chapman, Alice Roberts, Margaret Thornton, Ruth Luck, Beth Wallace, Doris Barbour, Charlie Verne Tinney, Mamie Jo Harbin, Messrs Dick Ozley, James and Francis Leonard, Mason Edwards, Jit Taylor, Jesse Weldon, Rux Carter, Milton Bird, J. W. Letson, A. D. and Harris Milton Gordon, Earl Elliott, and Felton Goodwin.

The Misses Chapman are former residents of Columbiana and their many friends are happily welcoming them back home again.

MR. AND MRS. MAX LEFKOVITZ ENTERTAIN B'HAM VISITORS

Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovitz gave a swimming party at Yamakita on Thursday afternoon honoring Mr. and Mrs. Joe Rosenhberger, of Birmingham. This inviting spot is proving most popular for the visiting contingent in Columbiana and after a delightful swim, Mrs. Lefkovitz served a picnic supper to the following guests: Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Elmer McGiboney, Mrs. Gray Goodwin and son, Davis, Mrs. Edna Roberts, Miss Myrtle Miles, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Friedberger and the honorees, Mr. and Mrs. Joe Rosenberger, Miss Hazel Rosenberger and Melba Rosenberger.

MESDAMES KILLINGSWORTH AND HARRIET ARE JOINT HOSTESSES TO W. M. U.

MISSS NIVENS ENTERTAINS VISITORS AT BRIDGE PARTY

The home of Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Nivens was the scene of one of the season's prettiest parties on last Wednesday afternoon when their attractive debutante daughter, Jeanette, entertained with four tables of bridge for Misses Katy Lou and Helen Chapman, charming house guests of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Taylor.

The house was prettily decorated with garden flowers and punch was served throughout the games. The prize for highest score was won by Miss Alice Roberts, a box of linen hankerchiefs. Dainty lingerie was presented to the honorees.

Mint ice cream and cake was served to the following guests: Misses Katy Lou and Helen Chapman, Margaret Thornton, Beth Walace, Alice Roberts, Clarice Evans, Margaret Ellis, Jane Fowler, Ruth Luck, Sarah Nell Carter, Eleanor Atchison, Doris Barbour, Eleanor Stroud, Jean Letson, and Elizabeth Taylor.

1,102 Boys In 4-H Clubs

Gadsden.—L. L. Self, Etowah Co. Agent, says that 1.102 farm boys in this county are now actively engaged in 4-H club work. They are organized into clubs with officers and a local leader. A splendid year is expected.

Crimson Clover Seed Saved

Scottsboro.—Crimson clover on Sand Mountain in this county has produced a good crop of seed which farmers have saved for planting. In the Tennessee Valley section more crimson clover will be planted as a pasture for sheep and also for soil improvement.

UNIVERSITY AND HOSPITALS COMMENDED BY LATE REPORT

University Of Alabama, Partlow State School And Bryce's Hospital Praised

The Brooking's Institute report, issued recently, gave an unusually favorable commendation to Alabama Insane Hospitals, Tuscaloosa, and praised the University of Alabama for its efficient management and low cost per capita of student.

The report would eventually place the state hospital system under a new Department of Public Welfare, with a single executive officer appointed by the Governor. The report realizes, however, that an immediate transition from a self-perpetuating board to a single-headed administrator would not be practicable, and that, therefore, a new department of Public Welfare should be created, headed by a board, vested with power to appoint and remove the head of the department.

VINCENT

Miss Marjorie Blankenship who was carried to the Woodlawn Hospital last Sunday is reported very ill. We wish for her a speedy recovery.

William Florey, of Atlanta is visiting his parents, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Florey.

Miss Agnes Wingard who was a guest of Miss Lucy McGraw last week, returned to her home in Columbiana Sunday.

Dr. and Mrs. J. C. Embrey and grand son made a business trip to Birmingham last Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Florey and Mrs. J. O. Elledge spent Sunday in Yamakita.

Rev. J. N. Davidson filled his regular appointment here Sunday, preaching a most excellent sermon.

Mrs. Sonnie Hatcher and son are visiting Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Florey.

Vincent Baptist W. M. S. will have a "spend the day" party with Mrs. Robert Hunt Friday and expect to finish their study course at this time.

Friends of Mrs. W. B. Freeze are glad to hear that after a lengthy illness, she is slowiy improving.

The Bank failure at Sylacauga affected a number of Vincent citizens.

Mrs. G. E. Franks and family who have been on an extended visit to Mrs. Frank's mother in Notasulga, have returned home.

Howard Embrey, of Birmingham, spent the week end with home folks.

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Jennings, of Birmingham, have been visiting here for several days.

CHIEF EXECUTIVE SLASHES SALARY FIFTEEN THOUSAND

Cabinet Members Agree To Take A Fifteen Per Cent Cut In Personal Wages Annually

At one of the regular semi-weekly cabinet meetings last week, President Hoover ruled himself a twenty per cent reduction and at the same time cut salaries of cabinet members fifteen per cent per annum. Ordinarily the president receives a salary of $75,000 a year and cabinet members $15,000. Under the new law they will receive $12,500 and the president $60,000.

This order was issued in view of the recent economy bill and by the urgent requests of cabinet members who were willing to turn portions of their salaries back into the treasury. It is also generally conceded that the order will affect departmental under secretaries who will receive a ten per cent reduction and assistant secretaries a nine per cent reduction.

HELENA HAPPENINGS

By COLA RUFFIN

Mr. Wallace Postell has gone to spend a few days in Fyffe, Alabama.

The writer of this column accompanied him as far as Collinsville, where she expects to spend a week.

Dr. and Mrs F. R. Lubwright departed Monday for Colorado, to be gone several weeks, in the interest of the doctor's health.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. McGinnis were the guests of Mrs. F. F. Mullins for the week-end.

Miss Bessie Vines, "that girl from over the river", (Davidson Farm) spent the past week as the guest of Mrs. W. G. McClendon, taking her departure for Birmingham and more visiting Saturday night.

Mrs. John H. Darden of Talladega Springs, remains with her daughter-in-law, Mr. G. G. Mullins, during Mrs. Mullins' continued illness.

The Helena Baseball Team lost a loosely played game to a team from Vinesville, to the tune of 20 to 5.

Mrs. G. W. Postell, her sister, Miss McKenzie, and her little daughter, Eleanor, are visiting another sister, in Birmingham.

A protracted meeting began at the Presbyterian Church, "Old Harmony" Sunday, to continue throughout the week. The Reverend Wright is conducting the meeting.

HARD-BOILED EGGS

It's an old story about frying eggs on the sidewalk in these torrid days, but not nearly so common to hear of hens laying hardboiled eggs. However, Mrs. E. C. Cleveland of Selma doesn't think her hen laid the egg hard boiled. She blames it on the sun too.

One of her hens laid an egg in a patch of weeds. When she broke the egg its consistency was noted to be hard-boiled.

THE BROOKING'S REPORT

We have hurriedly skimmed the Brooking's report, pausing here and there at vital points. The report is very exhaustive (not to say exhausting) and is printed in five volumes embracing 750,000 words.

We want to be fair in our estimate of the report, but truly, we cannot see its value in relieving the immediate needs of the state. It is no doubt informing as regards the present organization and administration of the state government; its financial condition, its present methods of taxation, revenues, expenditures, and debts, and as a means of reference it may be valuable to legislators and other officials, as well as to private citizens who are interested in these matters.

In-so-far as pointing to any practical solution of the state's financial and taxation problems, to the end that the tax burden might be decreased, we find the report distinctly disappointing. While the necessity of economy is suggested at various points, there is almost an entire absence of worthwhile recommendations whereby economy might be effected.

The abolishment of various present bureaus and boards is recommended, the creation of others seemingly equally expensive is advocated. New bond issues, an income tax, and a sales tax are suggested, but there is nothing original in these suggestions.

The recommendation that the state constitution be revised is no doubt good, but our own political leaders thought of that long ago. The recommendation that the legislature be composed of one chamber may possibly be sound, but neither the House nor Senate is likely to submit to a proposal that it be abolished.

A radical proposal is that which would limit the elective officers of the state to a governor and a lieutenant governor, giving the governor power to appoint all cabinet officers, and giving the attorney general authority to appoint all circuit solicitors and sheriffs in the entire state. The tendency of the recommendations is to concentrate power in Montgomery, taking from the counties much of the measure of self-government which they now have. These recommendations would not be approved by the voters, consequently they are worthless from a practical standpoint, and this is true of most of the recommendations in the report.

So, while the Brooking's report contains much information, presented in fairly convenient form, we doubt that the changes suggested will greatly appeal to the legislature or to the electorate, so far as its major recommendations are concerned.

The report cost the taxpayers $20,000, and its printing and distribution will add several additional thousand to its cost. From the limited study we have been able to give it we conscientiously do not feel that the report is worth what it cost.

WHAT A MAN! THIS ROOSEVELT

As we observed the movements of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, following the news of his nomination by the convention at Chicago, we could not help but observe the similarity of the personality between that of the nominee and the vigorous, self-reliant, "Rough-Rider" President "Teddy" Roosevelt. The comparison was striking.

Perhaps without a single thought of what the impetuous "Rough Rider" would have done under similar circumstances, Franklin D. Roosevelt gave a perfect example of all the fine qualities of initiative and bold leadership possessed by the late Theodore Roosevelt, adding a few astonishing touches of his own.

First, without a moment's hesitancy, he smashed the ancient precedent, cherished by both parties, that one must pretend ignorance, of the presidential nomination until dignified committees are formed and the stage has been set for a stilted and formal notification. He could indulge no such delay with the national house on fire and the only hope of relief lying in the safe arrival of the Democratic Party in Washington.

It was no time for delay; no time for stilted formalities; thousands were hungry; thousands were idle; thousands were without hope except as hope rests in Democratic success and the application of Democratic principles to the conduct of public affairs, and he could not wait. Despite lowering clouds and whistling winds and the play of lightning along the way, he sped by air to Chicago to pick up the cudgel in behalf of suffering humanity!

Again he smashed a precedent in the preparation of his acceptance speech. For generations nominees had struggled over such documents, consulting party leaders, weighing each word, each paragraph. But not so with Franklin D. Roosevelt. Sharply defined in his brilliant mind was the picture of distressed millions; men and women throughout the length and breadth of the land living under a cloud of apprehension that robs day of its joy and night of its slumber, and in short crisp sentences he expresed his thoughts to a secretary as the three great motors roared and the huge plane rocked to the beating of contrary winds.

Then, when he had reached Chicago, greatly delayed by storms along the way, he passed through the strain of buffeting thousands into a vast auditorium to face a colossal demonstration, and began that magnificent oration, prepared under conditions never before dreamed of in the annals of politics.

And when he spoke there was no note of uncertainty, no evidence of haste or of strain. Like the notes of a flawless bell, his fine, full voice swept to the far corners of the immense stadium and held the weary thousands enthralled; enthralled not only by the finished character of the address but by its clear, unfaltering and insistent challenge to the American people to come and take charge of their government that it might be conducted by them and for them.

What a man! this Roosevelt.

And it is such a man that the country needs; a man of vision, of courage, of initiative, of self-reliance and of the mental and physicial stamina that admits of instant response to every demand. And most of all, it needs a man conscious of the needs of the masses, and grimly, positively and most sincerely committed to a program looking to their relief.

Such a man is Franklin Delano Roosevelt, worthy kinsmen of the other human dynamo, Theodore Roosevelt, and even more intimately in touch with the heart-throbs of the people than was the great "rough rider" himself. Combined within this great men are the qualities of the boldness and frankness of "Teddy" Roosevelt, the statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson, and the Democracy of Thomas Jefferson.

Think It Over

The public is now being regaled with the news that $10,000,000 will have to be raised to conduct the Hoover-Roosevelt battle for the presidency. In 1928 the two parties spent a total of $16,500,000.

When the politicians of both parties are telling how much money it will take to care for the needy people this winter, it looks like an economic crime to raise $10,000,000 to be spent by the two parties largely in blackguarding opposing candidates.

Let both parties, if they are sincere in their advertised desires to help the needy, donate their millions of campaign funds for relief work this winter. And let the people vote in a normal manner for their political choice, free from the highpressure influence of a $10,000,000 slush fund.

What Creates Payrolls

Wisconsin has been receiving considerable publicity through the newspapers on the political and taxation policies which it has established and which are evidently discouraging normal industrial growth in that state.

A lot of people seem to be awakening to the fact that it takes industries, investments and payrolls to create and maintain employment and that taxation and legislative policies which discourage normal activity, strike directly at the dinner-bucket brigate and the taxpayers' pocketbook.

The "Best Friend"

In commenting on some of our present-day problems, the Portland Oregonian says editorially that life insurance is something no man or woman can afford to be without and that the harder the times, the more important it is to scrimp and save to meet one's premium payments which are necessary to keep protection in force. It says:

"People pressed by present-day conditions are giving up life insurance. Others, through fear, are failing to take advantage of what their 'best friend' offers them. If pressed too hard, a policyholder is able to borrow on his policy—a thing which should not be done unless dire necessity demands it. But this borrowing privilege may provide the means out of a difficult situation.

"Life insurance offers opportunities nothing else does. It gives the insured a feeling of safety and makes the family happy to know they have protection—and protection, in whatever form, is a mighty big thing. Instead of allowing premiums to lapse, people should put forth every possible effort to meet them.

Two Months' Work For Nothing

How would the average citizen like to work 61 days without any pay whatever?

The answer is that he wouldn't like it at all. But that, in effect, is what he is doing. Sixty-one days' work out of each year is required to pay the cost of government. In 1924 it was 46 days, and 1913 about 25 days.

The ratio is constantly rising. Carried to the inevitable conclusion, it means that in the not-too distant future, the taxpayers will be working for the taxeaters all the time, and for themselves not at all. Everytime a new bureau is created, every time a new department comes into existence a little more of the money we earn finds its way into the Treasury.

As President Hoover has said, to continue on the tax road we are traveling is to impoverish the nation. In the last 16 years are found in hoarding of capital, industrial retrenchment, unemployment. The tax issue, in all its phases, is one of the most important problems the American people have ever faced.

Immediate Taxation Retrenchment Essential

In a recent address, a prominent American said: "By borrowing to cover our current governmental expenses . . . we drain the capital of the country into public securities and draft it away from industry and commerce."

In 1913 cost of of government was about $1 for every $15 of national income. It is now $1 to every $5.00. For every federal income taxpayer there are one and one-quarter persons whose source of income is the government.

Faith — Patience — Fortitude — Courage

In an article on the severity and extent of the depression in this country, the Manchester, England, Guardian says: "Under all these trials the American people have behaved with admirable fortitude and patience."

That is a fine testimonial to the temper of our people. They have, perhaps better than any other people in the world, born inescapable burdens without losing either faith or courage. They have realized that drastic, thoughtless action is not necessary—that, in the normal course of events, our problems will be solved. They have put shoulders to the wheel and have bent every resource to meeting the exigencies of depression.

A people who can do as our people have done in a time of unprecedented stress need have no fear for the nation's future.

Farmers Are The Big Factor

When it comes to the dairy industry, we hear more about the distributors of milk products than of the farmers who do the actual producing. But, from the economic standpoint, the distributors are pretty small fry when compared to the farmers.

The dairy industry represents an investment of $10,250,000,000. Of this amount about $9,000,000,000 represents the farmers' investment in land, buildings and equipment. The distributors' investment is the balance—$1,250,000,000.

In other words, the 3,000,000 farmers who own the cows and the farms and produce the milk, are a good deal more important than the 30,000 distributors, even though the latter are necessary to the business. Yet, the farmer gets the short end of the stick. When prices are reduced, the cut is usually taken out of his share. As a result, at a time when millions of farmers are losing money and few are making profits, other factors in the dairy industry are making as large a unit profit as they ever did.

The cooperative movement is the farmers' hope for remedying this condition. The fact that millions of farmers have created and are loyally supporting thousands of cooperatives throughout the country, is a fine augury for the agricultural future.

Farm Women To Meet

Auburn, Ala.—The annual meeting of the Alabama Council of Home Demonstration Club Women will be held at Auburn during Farmers Week, August 2, 3, and 4, according to Mrs. J. D. Giles, president. Officers will report on the work of the organization during the year and plan for their work for the ensuing year. Among the speakers will be Miss Mary Mims of Louisiana, whose subject will be "Community Organization;" and Professor L. N. Duncan, Auburn extension director.

Other Newspapers Say

A TAX-FREE CITY

One of the most interesting items of recent weeks is one carried in the Jacksonville newspapers which tells of the efforts made on the part of one of the city commissioners for a tax-free city.

Jacksonville owns its own public utilities and, therefore, is in a position to talk about being tax-free. Earnings of the municipal power and light and water companies are returned to the owners, to people, in reduced taxes. They have grown to such an extent that this commissioner, who is in charge of public utilities, has seen his way clear to propose that all city taxes be abolished.

What a wonderful advertisement it would be for a city to be tax-free! What a lure for factories and industries! What an incentive for people to own their own homes!

There are in the United States some seventy cities and towns which are tax-free. Practically every one of them, according to information available, has become so through earnings of municipally owned public utilities.—Pensacola Journal.

THE LAWLESSNESS OF THE LAW ENFORCERS

The growing evil appears to be the lawlessness of the law enforcers. The horrible brutalities inflicted on suspects, helpless in the charge of detectives trying to force confessions from them and on convicted men held in prisons or camps show little advance over days and practices of long ago, if indeed they are not worse, because tortures were formerly legal, while today they are as illegal as any of the crimes or suspected crimes, of those who are made the subjects of them. There is a growing tendency of courts and juries to throw out evidence, brought out by tortures. What is needed is a few cases of severe punishment of the brutal perpetrators of offenses against those in their charge, entitled by law and all the dictates of humanity to fair treatment and not to be the victims before conviction of deeds, which the constitution guarantees protection from even for the convicted. Is not the growing prevalence of such crimes strong-evidence of the breaking down of our civilization and may not some of those who tolerate such lapses of barbarism because the subjects are poor and friendless, be wondering some day over the cruelties of revolutionaries who get beyond control and wreak vengeance, on those who showed them no mercy?—Fairhope Courier.

LET'S HAVE A DESIRE TO GO ON!

A few days ago we were impressed with a story which should help everyone—in business, in society, and in life. We quote it below, believing that it will do some of our readers good. The story as written follows:

Among the men whose friendship I enjoyed was the late C. W. Barron, owner of the Wall Street Journal.

One day in Boston I received a message that he was sick in New York and wished to see me before he died.

I hurried home by the fastest train, but when I reached his hotel I discovered that he had given up all idea of dying. He was in bed, but he was telephoning, dictating, receiving visitors, and having a glorious time.

He had been close enough to eternity, however, so that the experience left a deep impression. When his secretary went out of the room, we talked about Death.

He told me two stories. The first was about a man who accumulated a large fortune, built a house on Fifth Avenue, put his feet on the windowsill, and said: "Now, I am going to enjoy myself". But he was like a watch spring which has been wound up tight for a long time, and being suddenly released, snaps in pieces. After only a few months of idleness he died.

The second story had been told to Barron by a noted surgeon. A woman, taken to the hospital for a slight operation, died almost before the anaesthetic was applied. The surgeon could not understand it. On looking into her history, he discovered that from the minute the operation was decided upon she had begun to prepare for the worst. She had made her will, given away her jewels, and divided her personal property.

The surgeon said: "That taught me a lesson. I shall never again operate until I find out what preparations the patient has made. If any person care so little about holding on to life that he makes all preparations

Sharp German Teeth
How to Curb the U. S. A.
Shorter Day, Better Work
Great Work, Great News

Teeth, and sharp ones, are in two decrees issued by President Von Hindenburg. Personal liberty, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and assembly, even the right to private property, that Germans thought would always be theirs, go overboard in this emergency.

Death and confiscation of property are the penalty for treason, incendiarism, damaging railroads, causing explosions, and other offenses hitherto punished with life imprisonment. Germany means to have peaceful reorganization even if it should be necessary to kill off a few, in addition to millions killed in war.

German methods will be studied by those that feel responsible for conditions here.

Statesmen of the British empire, gathered at Ottawa to promote British prosperity, decide that Britons are to buy and sell among themselves, shutting out foreigners, and particularly the United States, as much as possible.

To cut down our export trade is the desire in England. Other nations have the same idea. Results show, in fact, that in June our exports fell below our imports.

That need not worry us, if we have intelligence. We have now what the English are trying to get—free trade within our empire of forty-eight states. We can buy from each other up to the limit of our home demand. Then dump our surplus among Britain's foreign customers, that can always be relied upon to buy at the lowest price.

Some news is cheerful. The India Tire and Rubber company of Akron, Ohio, increases wages 20 per cent, to make up for a similar cut in January. Employees were told that if they made the concern profitable wages would come back. They did it, working six hours a day, six days a week. The management says the increased leisure, freedom from factory monotony, enjoyed by the men accounts for an unusual production record.

Other employees might consider that. The five-day week, demanded by the Federation of Labor, with an eight or even six-hour day, if capacity of machinery should make that necessary, may be found as productive in the long run as the old long week and day with tired workers.

This is really big news, important to the future of the United States, to many great cities, to other cities still to be born and to millions of Americans.

The treaty between the United States and Canada for the construction of a great St. Lawrence ocean ship canal from the Atlantic to the Great Lakes has been signed. It will cost nearly six hundred million dollars, twice as much as the Panama canal, and take seven years to build.

When the canal is finished, Chicago, Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland, all cities on the lakes, will be seaports as much as New York, Boston or San Francisco.

Food and other products from all farms within reach of the lakes, steel from Gary, Buffalo and other plants, products of all the factories of all the lake cities, harvesting machinery, Detroit's automobiles, all will travel to all parts of the world, by water, at low freight rates.

The great cities of the lakes will grow in importance, wealth, population and prosperity, and other cities, innumerable, will add to the number of seaports and factories within reach of ocean traffic. "It hath not yet been shewn what we shall be."

It appears the killing of twenty-year-old Hyman Stark by Long Island policemen, in the course of a "third-degree" treatment, included some unusual features. Among them was what a policeman calls "rocking." It is alleged that a police official, second in command, put one foot on the prisoner's stomach, the other on his neck, and rocked from foot to foot, asking between times, "Now will you confess?"

The man died; his larynx was broken. Doctors testified that he was beaten by a rubber hose to emphasize the persuasive character of the "rocking" process.

Two signs of prosperity in the news. One thousand more workers were hired in Massachusetts in June. Eighteen new plants started, four others expanded. Shoe manufacturing is going ahead.

Joyful news from Reno, Nevada. The number of divorces has increased 100 per cent, and Nevada had a bigger increase in marriages than any other state. "Swing your partners."

Dr. A. S. Blumgarten says political orators of the future may describe the glands of their candidates instead of describing their moral qualities. The "keynoter" will announce "a man who" as one with marvelous adrenal and pituitary glands.

The glands are as important to body, brain, health and efficiency as the battery to a searchlight or doorbell.

Says WILL ROGERS

BEVERLY HILLS.—Well all I know is just what I read in the papers, or what I run into. I have prowled around the world quite a bit to try and see a lot of different kinds of people, but right here yesterday almost on my own doorstep I saw the biggest conglomeration of breeds and nationalities I ever saw. The League of Nations has moved right to Hollywood. How it all happened I went out to the Olympic Village, that's the place all these foreign and domestic athletes are stabled. There is just about 160 acres of solid cross breeds. Its built on a high hill overlooking Los Angeles, and its all laid out in streets, and the afig of each Nation is out in front of their Igloos. The little houses corrall four persons, a kind of two room affair that has two in each room, with a little porch out in front. They are not permanent, but they figure they will last till the medals are a distributed, and everybody that dident get one will be on his way home sore.

But I tell you the Committe that has handled this thing has done a fine job. They have made it just about as pleasant and convenient as it would be possible to do with a couple of thousand folks. They spoke about 19 hundred languages. There was a lot of em there already when I visited the place. Finland come in that day. Nurmi is kinder the Greta Garbo of the whole affair. They dont know now if they are going to let him compete or not. It seems over in Finland one time when he went to an Athaletic meet, he accepted too much expense money. They only allow em what they can live on, and they live on dried fish over there, so Nurmi took two more fish than he could have actually subsided on, and they call him now a professional. I would call him a "Glutton" on fish, but the Athletic Association still call it professional. Well if they dont let him run it will be like having a Democratic Convention and not have Al Smith.

These Finns, there is no Fords in Finland. Well there is Hellingsford, but no Model T Fords. And what we do in a Ford why a Finn can do on his feet. Instead of five or six folks going out on Sunday in a Ford, why five or six Finns just hit out in a high lope, and only stop at these fish filling stations, refule and run on.

India has a gang here all dressed like Gandi. The man running the "Round Up" of medal hunters says you learn a lot about what the League of Nations is up against when you try to please all these. That is in laying out the cottages or who will be next to who. For instance they found they couldent put France and Italy on the same hill. They then asked France who they wanted to be near, and France said Germany. Well that was fine. Then when Germany got here they asked them, and Germany said they dident want to be near France. Finland dident want to be near Sweden. They have tryed to arrange em in groups where for instance the English speaking Nations are togeather, England, U. S., Canada, Australia, South Africa. Then all the Spanish American bunch in one group.

Each country had its own dining room and its own cooks. They just give their order to the head of the village what it is they want in the way of groceries and meats and fruits, and its handed out to their cooks, then they prepare it for their gang as they see fit. I was in the Sweedish kitchen and dining room, he said all they eat was fruit, that they didnt eat two ounces of meat a day. They had twenty seven in there and said there was forty more coming. I asked him what he would do when they come and he said, "I will just slice up more fruit."

One old big Argentine boy that looked like Firpo was out near the village practicing the shot put, and heaved it toward one of these little houses and carried it away on his cannon ball. Now they have sent him out on the desert to practice. He will about knock down Mount McKinley.

They have one big assembly room or hotel lobby affair where they all gather and meet friends. They dont allow any women visitors in the inside of the village, you can go to this reception room and that is as far as they can go. There is some women athletes but they are going to keep them over in some cages some place.

The events are held in about a dozen different places so no one knows where to go or what they really want to see. But its all done on schedule, so it is possible to see it. There is 48 Nations here, some with only one or two athletes some with a hundred or more. It looks like it will be a great show, you dont want to miss it. Its an awful lot of running and a lot of jumping for nothing, but as long as they enjoy it why I guess its all right. They give these boys all this for $2.00 a day, so thats cheaper than staying at home. So they just as well be here argueing with the judges as not.

NOT ALWAYS WISE TO TRUST "CHARMS"

Some Have Been Known to Work Backwards.

Little Eva is the most superstitious person I know. She wears an elephant's hair ring on her finger and carries a rabbit's foot in her bag. She observes all the known ceremonies for prevention of misfortune, such as saying "bread and butter" when walking with a friend and the two are separated by passing on opposite sides of a lamp post. Whenever she is unwise enough to remind the unkind fates that she has not had a cold in a long time, she finds that it confuses them a little if she knocks on wood and it cripples their efforts at revenge.

Recently she presented a friend a rabbit's foot for her protection, but it played her false. Shortly thereafter the friend was in an automobile accident, and had her scalp ripped open for quite a space. But did this disaster shake Eva's faith in efficacy of rabbit pedals? Not at all! She had two explanations ready in a moment. One was that inasmuch as she had not killed the rabbit herself she could not be sure that it was the left hind foot. This is the only foot that has any real magic in it, but commercial dealers are not careful to ascertain the original location of the amputated foot.

The other explanation is that everybody has two contrary signs, and perhaps in this instance the rabbit's foot worked backwards. You just can't trust magic not to reverse itself for some people. Take four-leaf clovers. To the vast majority they bring good luck, but to little Eva they bring illness, disappointment and disaster, and she would sooner pick poison ivy than the treacherous clover. Then there are the terrible black cats, the sight of which is fraught with disaster for so many. With little Eva the omen reverses itself. She is a cat worshiper and has raised dozens of black ones. She became so used to their criss-crossing before her that it established a sort of immunity. She discovered it once when a black cat saved her life. The animal ran across her path and she stooped to pet it just before two automobiles crashed together and piled up on the sidewalk at the exact spot where she would have been passing if she hadn't stopped to pet the cat.

Our office boy is not so lucky. The last time a black cat ran across his path he had four flat tires before the day was done. True, the tires weren't so good anyway, but they would have held up very well if it hadn't been for the cat. He has very bad luck with brooms, too. Every time he is hit by one he gets arrested for something. Once when he was sweeping out his father's store, he hit a friend playfully with the broom. "Oh, don't do that," the friend cried, "I'll be arrested!" And within 24 hours he was riding to jail in the Black Maria for speeding. Little Eva says it is a sure sign and that one reason she hates housework is that brooms are such a menace. The vacuum cleaner has helped to keep some of our best women out of jail. Eva thinks it would be a smart idea for all policemen to carry a broom with which to hit obstreperous gangsters.

Down in the island of Haiti they have a sweet little custom that Eva is thinking of adopting. They make an effigy of their enemies which they torture with good effect. In order to make the torture effective they must get a piece of their enemy to paste on the effigy. A hair from his head, a paring from his toe nail, or even the dirt upon which he has spat is sufficient. The witch doctor then puts a curse on the image, and all that is necessary is to stick a pin in the effigy in the exact spot where you want the enemy to hurt. The only trouble is that it doesn't work so well on Americans. When the United States marines went to Haiti the natives made countless effigies with which to torture the intruders, who guffawed loudly at the spectacle, and never had a single pain. This would argue that the enemy must be possessed of a lively belief in magic before he could be discomfited, but it is worth a trial.

No matter how much common sense people have, few of them are free from some form of superstition. There are those who swoon if they sit down to a table that has thirteen round it. Others can't walk under a ladder without falling in a fit, but Eva is the only one I know who believes in every form of balderdash in existence. Even when the rabbit foot slips it has no effect on her belief in charms or her vivid respect for voodooism.—Indianapolis News.

Biblical Fortress of Sichem

Geographically Sichem was one of the most important points in Palestine. Situated in the narrow mountain pass between Mounts Garizim and Ebal—the high road of travel between the east and west—it blocked the route from the Jordan valley to the coast plain and protected the coastal region from the invasions of the nomadic hordes coming from the east. Its strategic function is thus obvious. Sichem offered a bold spectacle: with the horizontal lines of the walls, one superimposed upon the other; with the gigantic dimensions of its stones, all concentrated in the elliptic city plan, the fortress loomed in the landscape. Standing at its side, the two natural bulwark, Mounts Garizim and Ebal, reinforced the impression of impregnability.

Even today one who stands at the foot of these gigantic walls has the sense of being, as the Biblical people wailed, "in our own sight as grasshoppers. One is impressed by its sheer physical strength, and understands the fearful panic of the Israelites as they listened in Kadesh Barnea to the reports which their spies brought back from the Land of Canaan.

The builders of tihs fortification system were the Hittites, who were known to have dwelt in Sichem as early as the time of Jacob, 1500 B. C. (Gen. 34).

Cim was nineteen, Donna fifteen. And now Sabra lived quite alone in the new house on Kihekeh street, except for a colored woman servant sent from Kansas. She ran the paper alone, as she wished it run. She ordered the house as she wished it. She very nearly ran the town of Osage. She was a power in the territory. And Yancey was gone, Cim was gone, Donna was gone. Sabra had refused to compromise with life, and life had taken matters out of her hands.

Donna was away at an eastern finishing school—Miss Dignum's on the Hudson. Yancey had opposed that, of course. It had been Sabra's idea to send Donna east to school.

"East?" Yancey had said. "Kansas City?"

"Certainly not."

"Oh—Chicago."

"I mean New York."

"You're crazy."

"I didn't expect you to approve. I suppose you'd like her to go to an Indian school. Donna's an unusual girl. She's not a beauty and never will be, but she's brilliant, that's what she is. Brilliant. I don't mean intellectual. You needn't smile. I mean that she's got the ambition and the insight and the foresight, too, of a woman of twice her age."

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"I'm not. She's like mamma in many ways, only she's got intelligence and drive. She doesn't get along with the girls here—Maurine Turket and Gazelle Slaughter and Jewel Riggs and Czarina McKee, and those. She's different. They go switching up and down Pawhuska avenue. They'll marry one of these tobacco-chewing loafers and settle down like vegetables. Well, she won't. I'll see to that."

"Going to marry her off to an eastern potentate—at fifteen?"

"You wait. You'll see. She knows what she wants. She'll get it, too."

"Sure it isn't you who knows what you want her to want?"

But Sabra had sent her off to Miss Dignum's on a diet of prunes and prisms that even her high-and-mighty old grandmother Felice Venable approved.

Cim, walking the prairies beyond Osage with that peculiar light step of his, his eyes cast down; prowling the draws and sprawling upon the clay banks of the rivers that ran so red through the Red Man's territory, said that he wanted to be a geologist. He spoke of the Colorado school of mines. He worked in the Wigwam office and hated it. He could pi a case of type more quickly and completely than a drunken tramp printer. Even Jesse Rickey, his mournful mustache more drooping than ever, protested to Yancey.

"She can't make a newspaper man out of that kid," he said. "Not in a million years. Newspaper men are born, not made. Cim, he just naturally hates news, let alone a newspaper office. He was born without an arm, or something. You can't grow it if you haven't got it."

"I know it," said Yancey, wearily. "He'll find a way out."

For the first time a rival newspaper flourished in the town of Osage. The town was scarcely large enough to support two daily papers, but Yancey's political attitude so often was at variance with the feeling of the territory politicians that the new daily, slipshod and dishonest though it was, and owned body and soul by territorial interests, achieved a degree of popularity.

Sabra, unable to dictate the policy of the Wigwam with Yancey at its head, had to content herself with the management of its mechanical workings and with its increasingly important social and club columns. Osage swarmed with meetings, committees, lodges, Knights of This and Sisters of That. The Philomathean and the Twentieth Century clubs began to go in for Civic Betterment, and no Osage merchant or professional man was safe from cajoling and unattractive females in shirtwaists and skirts and eyeglasses demanding his name signed to this or that petition (with a contribution. Whatever you feel that you can give, Mr. Hefner. Of course, as a leading business man . . .).

They planted shrubs about the cinder-strewn environs of the Santa Fe and the Katy depots. They agitated for the immediate paving of Pawhuska avenue (it wasn't done). The Ladies of the Eastern Star. The Venus lodge. Sisters of Rebekah. Daughters of the Southwest. They came into the Wigwam office with notices to be printed about lodge suppers and church sociables. Strangely enough, they were likely to stay longer and to chat more freely if Yancey and not Sabra were there to receive them. Sabra was polite but businesslike to her own sex encountered in office hours. But Yancey made himself utterly charming. He could no more help it than he could help breathing. It was almost functional with him. He made the stout, commonplace, middle-aged women feel that they were royal—and seductive. He flattered them with his fine eyes; he bowed them to the doors, their eyeglasses quivered. He was likely, on their departure, to crumple their carefully worded notice and throw it on the floor. Sabra, though she made short work of the visiting Venuses and Rebekahs, ran their notice and, if necessary, carefully rewrote it.

"God A'mighty!" he would groan at noonday dinner. "The office was full of Venuses this morning. Like a swarm of overstuffed locusts."

Sabra was at the head of many of these Betterment movements. Also if there could be said to be anything so formal as society in Osage, Sabra Cravat was the leader of it. She was the first to electrify the ladies of the Twentieth Century Culture club by serving them Waldorf salad—that abominable mixture of apple cubes, chopped nuts, whipped cream, and mayonnaise. The club fell upon it with little cries and murmurs. Thereafter it was served at club meetings until Osage husbands, returning home to supper after a day's work, and being offered this salvage from the feast, would push it aside with masculine contempt for its contents and roar, "I can't eat this stuff. Fix me some bacon and eggs."

From this culinary and social triumph Sabra proceeded to pineapple and marshmallow salad, the recipe for which had been sent her by Donna in the East. Its indirect effects were fatal.

When it again became her turn to act as hostess to the members of the club she made her preparations for the afternoon meeting, held at the grisly hour of half-past two. Refreshments were invariably served at four. With all arrangements made, she was confronted by Ruby Big Elk with the astounding statement that this was a great Indian festival day (September, and the corn dances were on) and that she must go to the reservation in time for the Mescal ceremony.

"You can't go," said Sabra, flatly. Midday dinner was over. Yancey had returned to the office. Cim was lounging in the hammock on the porch. For answer Ruby turned and walked with her stately, irritating step into her own room just off the kitchen and closed the door.

"Well," shouted Sabra in the tones of Felice Venable herself, "if you do go you needn't come back." She marched out to the front porch, where the sight of the lounging Cim only aggravated her annoyance.

"This ends it. That girl has got to leave."

"What girl?"

"Ruby. Twenty women this afternoon, and she says she's going to the reservation. They'll be here at half-past two." It was rather incoherent, but Cim, surprisingly enough, seemed to understand.

"But she told you a month ago."

"Told me what? How do you know?"

"Because she told me she told you, ever so long ago."

"Maybe she did. She never mentioned it again. I can't be expected to remember every time the Indians have one of the powwows. I told her she couldn't go. She's in there getting ready. Well, this ends it. She needn't come back."

She flounced into the kitchen. There stood a mild-mannered young Indian girl unknown to her.

"What do you want?"

"I am here," the girl answered, composedly, "to take Ruby Big Elk's place this afternoon. I am Cherokee. She told me to come." She plucked Ruby's blue and white checked gingham kitchen apron off the hook behind the door and tied it around her waist.

"Well!" gasped Sabra, relieved, but still angry. Through the kitchen window she saw Cim hitching up the two pintos to the racy little yellow phaeton that Yancey had bought. She must run out and tell him before he left. He had seemed disturbed. She was glad he was clearing out. She liked having the men folks out of the way when afternoon company was due.

Ruby's door opened. The girl came out. Her appearance was amazing. She wore a dress of white doeskin hanging straight from shoulders to ankles, and as soft and pliable as velvet. The hem was fringed. Front, sleeves, collar were finely beaded in an intricate pattern that was more like embroidery than beading. On her feet were moccasins in ivory white and as exquisitely beaded as the dress. It was the robe of a princess. Her dark Indian eyes were alive. Her skin seemed to glow in contrast with the garment. The girl was, for the moment, almost beautiful.

"Hello, Theresa Jump. . . . This is Theresa Jump. She will do my work this day. I have told her. I will be back tomorrow morning."

She walked slowly out of the house by way of the kitchen door, across the yard with her slow insolent dragging step. A stab of suspicion cut Sabra. She flew to the back porch, stood there a moment. Ruby Big Elk walked slowly toward the barn. Cim drove out with the phaeton and pintos. He saw the Indian woman in her white doeskin dress. His eyes shone enormous. He lifted his head as though to breathe deeply. At that look in his face Sabra ran across the yard. One hand was at her breast, as though an Indian arrow had pierced her. Ruby had set one foot in its cream-white moccasin on the buggy step. Cim held out his free hand.

Sabra reached them, painting. "Where are you going?"

"I'm driving Ruby out to the reservation."

"No, you're not. No, you're not." She put one hand in a futile gesture on the buggy wheel, as though to stop them by main force. She knew she must not lose her dignity before this Indian woman—before her son. Yet this thing was, to her way of thinking, monstrous.

Cim gathered up the reins, his eyes on the restive ponies. "I may stay to see some of the dancing and the Mescal ceremony. Father says it's very interesting. Big Elk has invited me."

"Your father knows you're going? Like this?"

"Oh, yes." He cast a slight, an oblique glance at her hand on the wheel. Her hand dropped heavily to her side. He spoke to the horses. They were off. Ruby Big Elk looked straight ahead. She had uttered no word. Sabra turned and walked back to the house. The hot tears blinded her. She was choking. But her pride spoke, even then. You must not go the kitchen way. That Indian girl will see you. They are all alike. You must go around by the front way. Pretend it is nothing. Oh, God, what shall I do! All those women this afternoon. Perhaps I am making a fuss over nothing. Why shouldn't he take the Indian girl out to the reservation and stop an hour or two to see the dances and the rites? . . . His face! His face when he saw her in that dress."

She bathed her eyes, powdered her nose, changed her dress, came into the kitchen, smiling.

Theresa Jump proved clumsy and unteachable. Sabra herself mixed and served the pineapple and marshmallow salad, and though this novelty proved a great success, the triumph of serving it was spoiled for Sabra. She bundled the girl off at six, after the dishes were done. Wearily she began to set the house to rights, but Yancey came home to a confusion of chairs and squashed pillows, a mingled odor of perfumery and coffee; a litter of cake crumbs, bits of embroidery silk, and crumpled tea napkins. His huge frame moving about the cluttered sitting room made these feminine remnants seem ridiculous. The disorder of the household irked him. Worst of all, Sabra, relieved now of her guests, was free to pour out upon him all the pent-up wrath, anxiety, and shock of the past few hours. Ruby. Cim. Theresa Jump. Peycte. Osage. If his own father allows such things—what will people say—no use trying to make something of yourself.

Yancey, usually so glib with quotations from this or that sonorous passage of poetry, said little. He did not even try to cajole her into a better humor with his flattery, his charm, his tenderness. His eyes were bloodshot, his hand more unsteady than usual. He had been drinking even more than was his wont, she knew that at once. By no means drunk (she had never seen him really drunk—no one had—he was seemingly incapable of reaching a visible state of drunkenness), he was in one of his fits of moody depression. That great shoulders sagged. The splendid head lolled on his breast. He seemed sunk in gloomy thought. She felt that he hardly heard what she was saying. She herself could eat nothing. She set a place for him at the dining room table and plumped down before him a dish of the absurd salad, a cup of coffee, some cake, a plate of the left-over sandwiches, their edges curled dismally.

"What's this?" he said.

"Pineapple and marshmallow salad. With Ruby gone and all, I didn't get anything for your supper—I was so upset—all those women . . ."

He sat looking down at the slippery mass on his plate. His great arms were spread out on the table before him. The beautiful hands were opening and closing convulsively. So a mastodon might have looked at a worm. "Pineapple and marshmallow salad," he repeated, thoughtfully, almost wonderingly. Suddenly he threw back the magnificent head and began to laugh. Peal after peal of Herculean laughter. "Pineapple and marsh—" choking, the tears running down his cheeks. Sabra was angry, then frightened. For as suddenly as he had begun to laugh he became serious. He stood up, one hand on the table. Then he seemed to pull his whole body together like a tiger who is about to spring. He stood thus a moment, swaying a little. "'Actum est de republica.'"

"What?" said Sabra, sharply.

"Latin, Latin, my love. Pineapple and marshmallow salad! 'It is all over with the Republic.'" She shrugged her shoulders impatiently. Yancey turned, stiffly, like a soldier, walked out of the room, flicked his white sombrero off the hall rack and put it on at the usual jaunty angle, went down the porch stair with his light, graceful step, to the sidewalk and up the street, the great head lowered, the arms swinging despondently at his sides.

Sabra went on with her work of tidying up the house. Her eyes burned, her throat was constricted. Men! Men! Cim off with that squaw. Yancey angry because she had given him this very feminine dish of left-overs. What was the use of working, what was the use of pride, what was the use of ambition for your children, your home, your town if this was all it amounted to? Her work done, she allowed herself the luxury of a deliberate and cleansing storm of tears.

Eight o'clock. She heated some of the afternoon coffee and drank it sitting at the kitchen table. She went out on the front porch. Darkness had come on. A hot September evening. The crickets squeaked and ground away in the weeds. She was conscious of an aching weariness in all her body, but she could not sleep. Her eyes felt as though they were being pulled apart by invisible fingers. She put her palms over them, to shut them, to cool them. Nine. Ten. Eleven. Twelve. She undressed, unpinned the braids of her thick hair, brushed it, plaited it for the night. All the time she was listening. Listening. One.

Suddenly she began to dress again with icy fumbling fingers. She did up her hair, put on her hat and a jacket. She closed the door behind her, locked it, slipped the key into the mail box. The Wigwam office. Yancey was not there. The office was dark. She shook the door, rattled the knob, peered in, unlocked it with the key in her handbag. Her heart was pounding, but she was not afraid of the darkness. A cat's eyes gleamed at her from the printing shop. She struck a light. No one. No one. The linotype machine grinned at her with its white teeth. Its iron arm and hand shook tauntingly at her in the wavering light. With a sudden premonition she ran to Yancey's desk, opened the drawer in which he kept his holster and six-shooters, now that Osage had become so effete as to make them an unessential article of dress. They were not there. She knew then that Yancey had gone.

Doc Valliant. She closed and locked the door after her, stepped out into the quiet blackness of Pawhuska avenue. Doc Valliant. He would go with her. He would drive her out there. But his office and the room at the rear, which was his dwelling, gave forth no response. Gone out somewhere—a case. Down the rickety wooden steps of the two-story brick building. She stood a moment in the street, looking this way and that. She struck her palms together in a kind of agony of futility. She would go alone if she had a horse and buggy. She could rent one at the livery stable. But what would they think—those men at the stable? They were the gossips of the town. It would be all over Osage, all over the county. Sabra Cravat driving out into the prairie alone in the middle of the night. Something up. Well, she couldn't help that. She had to go. She had to get him.

Toward the livery stable, past the Bixby house. A quiet little figure rose from the blackness of the porch where all through the day the traveling men and loafers sat with their chairs tilted back against the wall. The red coal of his cigar was an eye in the darkness.

"Sabra! What is this! What are you doing running around at this hour of the night?"

Sol Levy, sitting there in the Oklahoma night, a lonely little figure, sleepless, brooding. He had never before called her Sabra.

"Sol! Sol! Cim's out at the reservation. Something's happened. I know. I feel it."

He did not scoff at this, as most men would. He seemed to understand her fear, her premonition, and to accept it with oriental fatalism.

"What do you want to do?"

"Take me out there. Hitch up and drive me out there. Cim's got the buggy. He went out with her."

He did not ask where Yancey was. He asked nothing. "Go home," he said, "Wait on your porch. I'll get my rig and come for you. They shouldn't see you. Do you want me to go home with you first?"

"No, no. I'm not afraid. I'm not afraid of anything."

Sol Levy had two very fine horses; really good animals. They won the races regularly at the local fairs. The little light rig with its smart rubber tires whirled behind them over the red dusty Oklahoma prairie roads. His slim hands were not expert with horses. He was a nervous, jerky driver. They left the town behind them, were swallowed up by the prairie. The reservation was a full two hours distant. Sabra took off her hat. The night air rushed against her face, cooling it. A half hour.

"Let me drive, will you, Sol?"

Without a word he entrusted the reins to her strong, accustomed hands; the hands of one who had come of generations of horse lovers. The animals sensed the change. They leaped ahead in the darkness. The light buggy rocked and bounced over the rutted roads. Sol asked her nothing. They drove in silence. Presently she began to talk, disjointedly. Yet, surprisingly enough, he seemed intuitively to understand—to fill in the gaps with his own instinct and imagination. What she said sounded absurd; he knew it for tragedy.

". . . pineapple and marshmallow salad. . . hates that kind of thing . . . Ruby Big Elk . . . Cim . . . his face . . . peyote . . . Theresa Jump . . ."

"I see," said Sol Levy, soothingly. "Sure. Well, sure. The boy will be all right. The boy will be all right. Well, Yancey—you know how he is—Yancey. Do you think he has gone away again? I mean—gone?"

"I don't know." Then, "Yes."

Three o'clock and after. They came in sight of the Osage reservation, a scattered settlement of sterile farms and wooden shanties sprawled on the bare unlovely prairie.

Darkness. The utter darkness that precedes the dawn. Stillness, except for the thud of their horses' flying hoofs and the whir and bump of the buggy wheels. Then, as Sabra slowed them down, uncertainly, undecided as to what they might best do, they heard it—the weird wavering cadences of the Mescal song the hail-like clatter of the gourd rattle shaken vigorously and monotonously; and beneath and above and around it all, reverberating, haunting, ominous, the beat of the buckskin drum. Through the still, cool night air of the prairie it came to them—to the overwrought woman, and to the little peaceful Jew. Barbaric sounds, wild, sinister. She pulled up the horses. They sat a moment, listening. Listening. The drum. The savage sound of the drum.

Fear was gnawing at her vitals, wringing her very heart with clammy fingers, yet Sabra spoke matter-of-factly, her voice holding a hard little note because she was trying to keep it from quavering.

Not Easy to Calculate Cost of Writing Letter

Just what it costs to write a letter is not known to nine out of ten business men. If they ever think of it they figure the postage and the cost of the stationery and let it go at that. Really the postage is an insignificant item in the cost of a letter.

An efficiency expert recently inquired of 58 concerns about the cost of their letters and it was learned that only 14 had any definite idea on the subject. The average cost as figured by these fourteen firms was between 35 and 40 cents. With an average salary of $45 a week for the dictator and $20 for the stenographer who turns out 30 letters a day and with the dictator using six minutes per letter the cost was 35.08 and 36.07 cents per missive, according to the cost of the stationery.

When the boss worth $10,000 or $20,000 a year does the dictating and uses a $60 per week secretary the letter will cost close to $1. Some letters written by hand cost thousands and thousands of dollars. Love notes, for instance, have had a cost that depends on the minds of the jurors hearing the damage suit.—Bob Holland in the Miami Herald.

Not Named for Davenport

The davenport (couch) is a comparatively modern piece of furniture, and was not named for the inventor, Davenport. The davenport which is named after the inventor is a style of writing desk, small, generally ornamented, and intended for a boudoir.

Standish Story Myth?

Apparently there is no evidence to support the assertion often made that Capt. Miles Standish, military commander of the Mayflower group of Pilgrims at Plymouth, lost one of his legs in battle and wore a "cork" leg. None of the contemporary historians and chroniclers mention the fact, and it is not so stated in the reputable histories of Plymouth colony. It is not known who started the story. Perhaps it originally arose from a confusion of Standish with Peter Stuyvesant, the one-legged governor of New Netherland.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Let Work Horses Drink Their Fill

Expert Advises Liberal Supply for Animals.

By E. T. ROBBINS, Live Stock Extension Specialist, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

Farmers can avoid heavy death loss in their horses by giving them plenty to drink while they are at work in the field, and by pasturing them at night.

This is the plan used by many men who farm extensively and successfully with horses, it is reported. Among these farmers are A. L. Robinson, Tazewell county; Col. George Seaman, Christian county; Henry Jurgens, Moultrie county; Fred Mudge, La Salle county, and Chris Gerber, Christian county.

Colonel Seaman, who has had long experience with thousands of army horses and mules in the Philippines, says that a hot horse can drink all the water it wants without injury if it starts right ahead with the work afterwards. His men took water to the fields last summer during the hottest weather and watered each horse once an hour from a bucket. None of his 56 work horses was hurt by the heat.

Chris Gerber explains the benefit of this practice by saying, "You cannot stew water out of a horse rapidly for half a day if you do not pour any into his 'radiator.' We all know that when a hot horse stops sweating, he is too hot and is likely to die."

Early Cutting Adds to the Value of Timothy

Most of our timothy is cut for hay after the blossoms have fallen and the seed is beginning to ripen. At that stage, the hay contains a very low percentage of protein. When, however, it is cut in early bloom, it carries a much higher percentage of protein and begins to approach clover in that respect.

For three years, the Ohio station has fed timothy, cut at different stages of growth, to pregnant ewes during the winter season and through the lambing period. Each year, substantially the same results have been obtained. When timothy was cut for hay just as the heads emerge, it was found to be nearly equal in feeding value to second-cutting alfalfa. Of course, when it is cut that early, the yield is greatly reduced, hence this is scarcely practical. However, if it is cut reasonably early, the quality is much better and the yield reduced little.—Wallace's Farmer.

War on Lice

Lice on live stock cause considerable annoyance and loss to farmers, and as the season advances the damage caused by these pests becomes more and more serious, unless steps are taken to control them. There are seven different kinds of lice which get their entire living from the blood and tissues of cattle, horses and hogs. All of these different lice are similar in construction and habits and they can readily be eradicated by effective control measures. A scientifically prepared animal spray is a valuable stock aid, killing lice quickly without harm to the skin. A thorough spraying of the animals and their surroundings every ten days soon destroys all lice. The sprayed stock should be kept in well-sheltered quarters until they are dry.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.

Emergency Pastures

Dry weather for two years has killed many seedings and made emergency pastures necessary in 1932. A mixture that has met with success in the corn belt is composed of 10 pounds of sweet clover and four pounds of timothy sown with three to three and one-half bushels of early oats. On sour soils a mixture of five pounds red clover, three pounds of alsike and four pounds of timothy is a better one. The new seeding can be pastured lightly when the grain is seven or eight inches high. The seeding should have a chance to get a foothold and will make good feed throughout the season after the oats are gone.—Prairie Farmer.

Agricultural Notes

Soybean oil meal produces firm pork, the same as tankage.

Expensive weed eradication programs will accomplish but little while farmers continue to use poor quality, ungraded seed.

Austrian field cress, one of Minnesota's dangerous new weed pests, resembles horse-radish. The roots are longer and more slender, the leaves smaller.

Tests at the Wisconsin experiment station indicate that when lambs are fed cracked barley and alfalfa hay, it is wise to chop the alfalfa and mix it with the barley.

Hand picking as many as possible of the asparagus beetles will pay in lessening the crop of eggs and larvae.

When hay containing less protein than alfalfa is fed, one should feed a protein concentrate with the corn or other grain.

Alfalfa can be successfully pastured without damaging the stand if good judgment is used. It should never be pastured when the land is so wet that the tramping of the animals will puddle the soil.

YOUNG COW MAKES SPLENDID RECORD

Yield Equals That of Five Ordinary Animals.

(By S. J. BROWNELL, New York State College of Agriculture.)

With cows like Lauderdale Lilly Posch, the old-fashioned family cow would become a neighborhood cow, for this four-year-old Holstein gave as much milk as five typical dairy cows, or enough for 65 people for a year when she recently made the record of 24,009 pounds of milk and 822.9 pounds of fat.

Lilly was bred by H. V. Bump of Cambridge but is now owned by Harry Yates of Orchard Park. Her mother is the daughter of North Star General Champion, who has fourteen daughters in the advanced registry of the breed, and made a record of 23,424 pounds of milk and 840 pounds of fat as a five-year-old.

Lilly Posch gave from 91 pounds of milk on her best day to 41 pounds on the last day of the test. She was fed an average of 16 pounds of grain a day composed of: 300 pounds of oats, 200 hominy, 300 distiller's grains, 200 bran, 100 gluten, 100 cotton seed meal, 100 oil meal, 20 minerals, 25 charcoal, and 10 salt. Her roughage was 20 pounds silage, 10 alfalfa hay, and 10 beet pulp daily. She was fed about forty pounds of red beets a day for about four months and during this period the beet pulp was cut to five pounds daily.

Growing Sentiment for Fewer and Better Cows

Three per cent of all dairymen in Illinois are members of dairy herd improvement associations and more of them will join the movement as fast as they realize that it often is possible to make more money from fewer and better cows, state dairy authorities claim. Also fewer and better cows not only will make more money but they will put less milk and butterfat on the market.

For instance, 10 cows like those that averaged between 450 and 500 pounds of butterfat in 1931 made as much return above cost of feed as 27 cows that averaged 200 to 250 pounds each. Returns above feed cost do not tell the whole story. In one case there are 10 cows to house and care for and in the other case 27 cows. Labor and equipment are important items of expense in producing milk and butterfat. Furthermore, the 10 cows made as much above cost of feed as the 27 cows and they produced 50,958 pounds less milk and 1,456 pounds less butterfat for market consumption.

Check the Separator

In a study of 1,027 separators in use by members of cow testing associations it was found that 12 per cent of all separators in use for less than one year did not skim clean. Of the separators that had been in use for five years, 35 per cent left .08 of one per cent of fat in the skim milk and of those that had been in use for 15 years 50 per cent did not do a good job of skimming.

This does not mean that there was anything radically wrong with these separators. It just meant that they were somewhat out of adjustment. The figures presented are given merely as reminders that it pays to check up on the cream separator once in a while to see whether it is doing as good work as it is capable of doing. When a separator leaves .05 of one per cent more of fat in the skim milk than it should, the loss in a herd of ten cows may run from four to six pounds of fat a month.—Wisconsin Agriculturist.

DAIRY FACTS

Nearly 700 New York dairymen in 51 counties tested 8,569 cows by mail in April.

A reliable dairy thermometer is cheap insurance against losing a premium or having milk rejected.

For the third successive year, a cow owned by Hugh Andrew of Haddington, England, has given 2,000 gallons of milk.

Teaching the calf to drink takes time, milk and other feeds for the young calf are costly, and in most parts of the country the calf requires stable room.

High yield per cow is the basis for profitable milk production. Cows producing less than 200 pounds of butterfat fail to pay for the cost of feed and labor.

Keep the calf pens and bull pens darkened and apply fly spray twice a day.

Prompt handling of milk and proper facilities for maintaining a favorable temperature during the summer are necessary to marketing first-grade cream.

The average 10-cow herd keeping records in Minnesota returned this past year about $230 more over feed cost than the average of all herds. Culling out the poor cows helps.

Electric Light Speeds Up "Activity" of Biddy

The modern chicken farm which hatches all of its chickens in incubators also uses electric light to encourage egg production, especially for the Easter season. This method has passed beyond the experimental stage and many large-scale chicken-raising establishments are now employing it with marked success.

From early November to the beginning of April the day's work of a hen is unduly shortened by lack of daylight. But when the days during that period are artificially lengthened by the use of electric light in the fowl houses, the hens stay awake, scratch about more, eat more food, and lay more eggs.

That is the whole theory, and it works out in practice. A very important part of its value lies in the fact that during the period from November to the end of March eggs usually cost the consumer more, and so bring a much better profit to the producer.

It has been found that hens subjected to the electric light treatment, however, do not necessarily lay an increased number of eggs in the course of a year.

The United States Department of Agriculture has long been studying the best kind of illumination for chicken houses, and is endeavoring to determine the right intensity of illumination.

Waiting for the Signal

Sister was visiting in the country and auntie had promised her she could gather the eggs. She was up bright and early the first morning and after making many fruitless trips to the henhouse, asked:

"Aunt Mildred, how can you tell when those hens lay?"

"When they cackle," she was told.

She stood around a while and finally said:

"Auntie, has those hens giggled yet?"

Barge on Reservoir

A new boat has been added to the municipal fleet of Los Angeles, Calif. This strange craft, officially known as a chlorine barge, will chug back and forth over the waters of the 100-acre reservoir that supplies water to the city. The boat will release chlorine gas, compressed to a liquid in eight tilted cylinders, into the water through long spouts. The powerful chemical kills germs and minute growths.

OLYMPIAD ATHLETES SPEAK FORTY EIGHT FOREIGN LANGUAGES

Giulio Guardini, Six Feet Seven Inch Italian, Is Defending Fencing Champion

The interest of amateur sport lovers the woorld over will be centered in Los Angeles, California for the next three weeks. Groups of athletes from all countries on the earth are already congregating in the Pacific coast city to take part in the tenth Olympiad.

On July ninth the first contingent from Japan landed in California amid the cheers and greetings of their fellow countrymen. They seemed to be little affected by the reception which was tendered them and went quickly to their quarters near the stadium.

Last Monday the advance guard of the Italian delegation landed in New York. Among the athletes was one who will without doubt be the tallest contestant. Giulio Guardini, who stands six feet, seven inches tall is the defending fencing champion. He first went to the Olympics in 1924. He won first place for his country that year and repeated in 1928. His tremendous reach makes him a formidable opponent for the cleverest of fencers.

A group of six Greeks have landed in New York and are now on their way across the continent. But Greece, the mother land of marathon runners, is not represented by a single entry in this event.

The United States lost many potential points when Miss Stella Walsh of Cleveland, the world's fastest woman, lost her job with the New York Central R. R. and accepted a position with the Polish consul in New York. Two days previous to her acceptance of the position she was offered a job as physical educational instructor in Cleveland. The American A. A. U. notified her that should she accept this position her amateur standing would be revoked. This was the deciding factor in making her decision and she refused naturalization.

The entertainment of all of these foreign athletes is a problem. There will be forty-eight languages spoken in the small village that has been built on the outskirts of Los Angeles for the housing of the visitors. Each country will have its own kitchen and its own cook to prepare the meals to which it is accustomed. The entertainment committee furnishes the food but is not responsible for the preparation of the meals.

The bungaloes which will house the athletes are models for neatness and compactness. Two persons are assigned to a cottage. Each has his own bed and clothes locker. A common table between the beds is used for a wrirting table and eating table. A screened porch runs along one side of the house. Each bungalo is equipped with lavatories, toilets, and showers, and running ice water.

The final selection of the American teams is yet to be decided. Intersectional preliminaries have been held throughout the country and the finals will be held at San Francisco within a few days.

The date of the Olympics is July 30 to August 14. Prior to the opening date this column will present the salient facts of the different events and attempt to give some idea of the United States' possibilities in the more important track and field events.

THIS WEEK IN POLITICS

pay the land annuities to the Bank of England amounting to some thirty-seven million pounds yearly. England has retaliated by authorizing the MacDonald Government to levy an important tax up to 100 per cent on all Irish goods. The Government immediately levied such a tariff of 20 per cent. Now Ireland has retaliated with a tariff of an equal amount on all British imports to Ireland so the battle is on.

There is also a movement, apparently sponsored by the Irish Government, to boycott British goods. On the face of it, regardless of the merits of the case, it seems that the Irish simply do not know when they are well off. They proudly claim that they can buy everything they need from the United States and other countries but can they sell their products to these countries? That is very doubtful and tho it is possible to admire Ireland's courage, there remains considerable doubt as to Ireland's good judgment in the affair.

TROUBLES!

Following is an actual letter written to a New York banking house, in response to its request for more collateral:

"It is impossible for me to send you a check. My present financial condition is due to the effects of federal laws, state laws, county laws, corporation laws, by-lows, brother-in-laws, mother-in-laws, and outlaws that have been foisted upon an unsuspecting public. Through the various laws, I have been held down, held up, walked on, sat on, flattened and squeezed until I do not know where I am, what I am, and why I am.

These laws compel me to pay a merchant's tax, capital stock tax, income tax, real estate tax, property tax, auto tax, gas tax, light tax, cigar tax, street tax, school tax, syntax and carpet tax.

The government has so governed my business that I do not know who owns it. I am suspected, expected, disrespected, examined, re-examined, 'til all I know is that I'm supplicated for money for every known need, desire or hope of the human race, and because I refuse to fall and go out and beg, borrow and steal money to give away, I am cussed and discussed, boycotted, talked about, lied to, lied about, held up, held down, and robbed until I am nearly ruined, so the only reason I am clinging to life is to see what the hell is coming next."—Advertising and Selling Magazine.

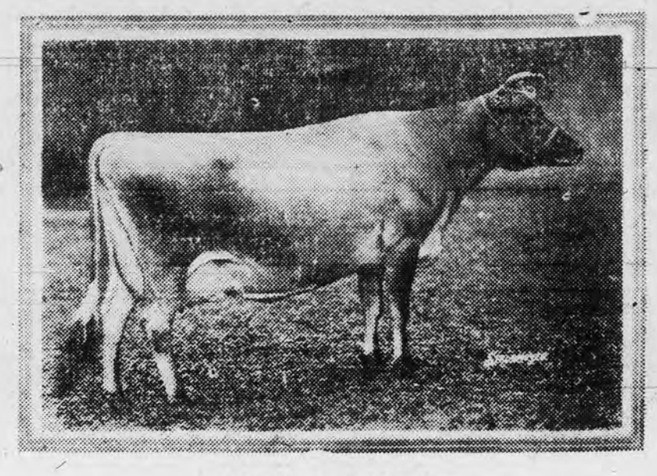
TENNESSEE JERSEY BULL IS GRAND CHAMPION

Oxford Lassy's Design 323676

Oxford Lassy's Design, the grand champion Jersey Bull at the 1931 National Dairy Exposition, St. Louis, Mo., is owned by Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Farrell, Crieve Hall Farms, Nashfille, Tenn., and is the first Tennessee bred bull of his breed to win this high award in the twenty-five years since the founding of the Exposition. He has an undefeated record in the ring this year and has been grand champion Jersey bull wherever shown. Other animals exhibited at the 1931 "National" by Mr. and Mrs. Farrell won the junior championships for both Jersey males and females and nine first prize blue ribbons, including for the third consecutive time, the first prize in the get of sire class. Design's Fern Oxford, the bull which triumphed three times in this class, is now head of the noted Crieve Hall Jersey herd and sired the grand champion and the two junior champions, all of which were bred at Crieve Hall Farms.

LAVENDER LADY IS GRAND CHAMPION JERSEY COW



Lavender Lady 737333

Lavender Lady, purebred Jersey cow owned by Hugh W. Bonnell, Youngstown Ohio, was grand champion Jersey cow and first prize winner in her class at the 1931 National Dairy Exposition, St. Louis, Mo. She is the first Jersey cow exhibited by an Ohio owner to take the grand championship ribbon at the "National", recognized for a quarter of a century as the major dairy cattle show of the United States. She is 8 years of age and has an official record of 533.88 pounds of butterfat, 9,988 pounds of milk, the equivalent of 667 pounds of butter and 4,654 quarts of milk produced in a year. Bred on the Island of Jersey, place of origin of the Jersey breed, she was imported to the United States and sold to Mr. Bonnell in 1927.

al Air Express to any point in the country through connecting airlines, motor bus and railroad express carriers. It is understood, according to J. T. Logue, General Manager of the Postal Telegraph's Southern Branch, that a special door-to-door pick-up and delivery service will be performed at all points.

In commenting on this service General Gibbs, who has been actively associated with aviation for over twenty years, said:

"The chief revenue of the transportation industry has always been derived from the hauling of commodities; this new air shipping movement, therefore, offers to the airlines the largest potential source of revenue. It is my opinion that this is potentially the most important step forard by the air transportation industry in many years. The airlines which have made this aggressive move are to be highly commended for their initiative, for I see a new impetus to aviation in this country as well as a new service to the public. The speed and facility of shipping and distributing commodities by air should be a new stimulus to business in the opening of new merchandise markets heretofore not available."

which the Shelby County Male Quartette entertained with several selections. This quartet is composed of Shirley, Bolin, Kendrick and Adams.

Congressman W. B. Oliver was introduced as the principle speaker of the afternoon. His address followed educational and economical lines. A beautiful ttribute was paid to the late Julia Tutwiler. His economy program and sound judgment in plans for educational problems received enthusiastic approval.

The contests for this occasion were in charge of Mrs. Fluker McGraw, and the winners are as follows: Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Shrader, the longest married couple. who, incidentally, celebated their Golden Wedding Anniversary last week in Shelby; Mr. and Mrs. Allen Jones, the newest new-ly-weds., having married on this day; the best looking man, Mr. Frank Baker, Montevallo, Route 1; the laurels for the largest family fell to Mr. and Mrs. Archie Wyatt who proudly boasted of a family of thirteen.

Rarely, if ever, has the writer enjoyed a day so crowded with oratory, music, the friendliness of smiles, good fellowship just radiating good cheer and bringing happiness to all.

ALABAMA FARM NEWS

Big Crop Of Feed

Heflin.—Cleburne County farmers have harvested this year bumper crops of good hay where they planted a winter legume and small grain together last fall. Austrian peas, hairy vetch, wheat, and oats were used, and County Agent E. R. Carlson anticipates an increased production of feed this way.

Rotary Club For Legumes

Anniston, Ala.—The Anniston Rotary Club has joined hands with County Agent S. R. Doughty in sponsoring winter legumes throughtout Calhoun County. The aim is to increase the acreage planted for soil improvement and also for grazing. E. L. Turner, Jr., and Gen. R. E. Noble are the Club's representatives on this project.

Dairying Is Growing

Demopolis, Ala.—The Demopolis creamery which closed two years ago because the cream supply was inadequate for operating is now making monthly 45,000 pounds of butter. Farmers in Marengo, Hale, Greene, and Sumter Counties are supplying milk. They are feeding their swimmilk to hogs, poultry, and calves.

WHAT PRICE GLORY

"A challenge to the authority of the United States government has been met swiftly and firmly. After months of patient indulgence the government met overt lawlessness as it always must be met if the cherished are to be preserved."

—Herbert Hoover, President.

After employing the tactics of an ostrich for several months by a self-inflicted imprisonment in the White House and an inability to see what was going on in his front yard, President Hoover suddenly issued an order and federal troops quickly and efficiently cleared the streets of Washington of the army of bonus seekers.

This order was not issued until the bonus army had become a dangerous, disorganized mob defying the Federal Government and engaging in disgraceful street brawls with the Washington police.

No man of any initiative or courage could have sat in the White House and permitted such a situation to develop. It would be impossible to imagine Grover Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, or Theodore Roosevelt sitting by in majestic inactivity while American citizens made a joke out of the American government.

Whether the bonus should or should not be paid is a matter to be settled by Congress, but the fact remains that the bonus army employed tactics in attempting to coerce Congress more suitable to Russia than to the United States.

It should not have been necessary for Federal troops to ride men down, or Washington police to crack skulls with nightsticks to handle the situation respecting these poor, hungry, desperate men. A sound government cannot be forced to action by a mob but this bonus army which arrived in the National Capital as an orderly group of citizens petitioning redress of grievances eventually developed into just that.

What action a Cleveland, a Wilson or a Roosevelt would have taken must be left to the imagination but it is safe to say that they would have taken some action. However, President Hoover, in his desire not to offend anyone in a presidential year waited until the situation was out of control and until it demanded the use of force.

President Hoover undoubtedly did the only thing he could have done after the situation reached the final stages but it seems slightly beneath the dignity of a president to boast about doing his duty, particularly after precipitating the crisis thru his own inactivity.

A UNITED DEMOCRACY

"Having in mind the broad purposes of my party, and the accomplishment of those things for which it has declared itself, I shall give my support to the Democratic ticket of Roosevelt and Garner."—Joseph B. Ely, Governor of Massachusetts.

When the Smith supporters at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago steadfastly held out for their candidate to the end and even on the last ballot failed to switch to Roosevelt, the natural desire arose to know what the attitude of these same supporters would be in the coming campaign.

Al Smith, himself, at first made no statement but later endorsed the ticket; true a somewhat qualified endorsement but still an endorsement. One by one the Smith men came into the fold but still Governor Ely who was supposed to have a great deal to do with the success of the party in Massachusetts made no statement.

Now Governor Ely has spoken by giving his support to the Roosevelt-Garner ticket. This statement solidifies the Democratic Party for the campaign and should go a long way in burying past animosities engendered in the campaign of 1928.

The endorsements of the Smith men have not been overly enthusiastic but they do give the lie to predictions that there would be a split or a third party movement within Democratic ranks.

In this respect the Democrats are in a much stronger position than the Republicans for there is a great deal of disaffection in Republican ranks, particularly among the "Sons of the Wild Jackass." Also Republican wets are definitely unenthusiastic about the platform and there are large numbers of normally Republican voters who have no admiration for either Hoover or Curtis.

The Democrats learned much in 1928 and Governor Ely's statement gives the Republicans to understand that if the Democrats are beaten this year the Republicans must beat them. They will not do it themselves as they have several times in the past.

ALABAMA EDITORS IN FAVOR OF RE-STOCK FARMING DEVELOPMENT

It Is Fundamental That Farmers Enrich Land For Livestock By Planting Legumes

Alabama editors, at their recent convention in Montgomery, declared themselves as being in favor of improvement and enlargement of livestock farming in Alabama. They made this one of the major projects in 1932.

In line with this, county agents and extension service representatives of Auburn expect to press forward with their livestock development work, realizing that the movement will be augmented by the power of the press. The plan provides for improving and increasing dairying, hogs, poultry, beef cattle, and, in some sections, sheep.

Preparatory to increasing the livestock industry and improving the net returns from it, emphasis is now being placed upon planting of winter legume seed this fall. Legumes enrich land so that farmers can make feed for livestock. This is fundamental, in view of the fact that livestock are feed on foot; and livestock products such as milk and eggs, are produced from feed.

Alabama farmers have found by experience that the yield of corn is frequently increased 15 to 25 bushels per acre as a result of plowing under one crop of either hairy vetch or Austrian peas. Another way of stating it is that one crop of either of these winter legumes generally doubles the yield of corn compared to what it would have been. This means that corn is available for feed.

Farmers who have tried winter legumes (hairy vetch and Austrian peas) declare that they are the best way now known for enriching their lands for corn, cotton, and other crops. Winter legumes are good for spring grazing as well as for hay when planted with oats.

"BRAIN FOOD" CAUSES NEW LAW LEGAL FIGHT

Fake Headache Cure Begins Battle Involving New Federal Law

On August 27, 1907, eight months after the Federal food and drug Act went into effect, a Government inspectator bought a package of a medicine labeled as a cure for headaches and as a "brain food". That purchase, according to Dr. F. J. Cullen, chief of drug control, Federal Food and Drug Administration, was the beginning of action that led to the first legal battle involving a drug under the new law.

Federal experts examined the so-called "brain food" and found that it contained a large quantity of a coal-tar chemical, acetanilid. Acetanilid, in some cases, eases pain and induces sleep, but it also depresses the heart and is a poison if taken in sufficient quantities. Labelling the preparation as a "brain food" disarmed the buyer's suspicion with regard to the dangerous character of the article. It also led people to believe that the article actually was a brain food. This drug was not only harmful, but was labeled with words that were misleading and deceptive. The government prosecuted the manufacturer and forced him to change the label.

SHELBY COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION HAS ALL DAY BUSINESS SESSION

Survey Of Shelby County School Systems Made Recently Presented By Professor

SCHOOL TRANSPORTATION AND DEVELOPMENT IS DISCUSSED

Teaching Staff Of County Commended For Professional and Progressive leadership

The Board of Education for Shelby County, composed of R. L. Holcombe, President, Dr. D. S. Lightcap, M. P. Jete, L. C. Mullins and Mrs. J. W. Arthur, held an all-day session in the Court house in Columbiana, Saturday, July 30.

The morning hours were devoted to business routine relative to the schools. Reconvening in the afternoon in the Court room, a report of the Complete Survey of Shelby County School System made last November by the Department of Education at the University of Alabama, working with the State Department in Montgomery, was presented by Edgar Morphet, Professor of Education at University of Alabama and R. E. Ledbetter from the State Department of Education in Montgomery.

This report has been carefully compiled and presents a complete account of the school situation in this County covering every angle. The report is voluminous and can only be briefly outlined in this article.

Realizing that educational problems differ from county to county and from community to community, due to the fact that different factors are likely to effect the situation in different places, the general factors bearing on the Educational Program and factors which may affect the program in Shelby County were discussed as follows:

1. Number and location of towns.
2. The wealth which represents the ability to support the educational program.
3. The location of large streams or swamps which are impassable at times, or which can be crossed only in places.
4. Mountain ranges and deep valleys which determine or influence the location of roads.
5. Condition of roads, that is, whether they are reasonably safe for transportation during the year.
6. Suitability of the soil in various sections for agriculture.
7. Industries and occupations of the people.
8. Shifts in population due to economic or other factors.

TAKE ADVANTAGE OF SAVINGS OFFERED BY OUR MERCHANTS

To be noted with much interest is the inner double page of this week's paper which bears the title "Lets Join Hands In Shelby County."

This page is in the interest of building up a much needed prosperity in this County of ours and it was only made possible through the cooperation of the merchants whose ads appear on that page.

The people of Shelby County will find that a good way to hasten the prosperity that we want is to trade in your community and, the Democrat takes this opportunity of suggesting that before you buy, look over this double page and see what some of the outstanding merchants of this County have to offer you.

SHELBY COUNTY HOME DEMONSTRATION CLUBS HAVE ANNUAL OUTING

Swimming, Dancing, Life-Saving And Many Other Useful Arts Taught By The Leaders

On Monday, July 25, the Women of the Home Demonstration Clubs of Shelby County assembled at Lake Jackson for their annual camping program with Miss Jessie Mae Carroll in charge of activities, assisted by Misses Beth Wallace and Louise Ellis, of Columbiana, and Miss Sara Langston of Centerville, who directed the recreation periods. Miss Anna Mae Langston taught stenciling and other phases of handicraft.

On July 27, fifty 4-H Club girls joined this interesting group and were divided into three teams with Shirley Cooper, leader of the Tigers, July Allen, leader of Gorillas, and Ruby Green, leader of Wildcats. Wednesday afternoon relays with points given to winners of each relay were presented. Swimming, peppy campfire programs, various contests, original songs and yells by each team made merry the nights.

Swimming, dancing and life saving were taught by the recreation leaders. Miss Margaret Garrett from Auburn gave instructions in handicraft. The girls learned to make fans and hats out of corn shucks and many other useful and artistic products were turned out.

Thursday night was "open house" and the program presented by the girls was enjoyed by a large number of visitors from Harpersville, Vincent, Calcis, Wilsonville and Columbiana. The three teams presenting original programs for the approval of their guests. The Tigers won in this contest for supremacy.

A "treasure hunt" was the important item on Friday's program and the "treasure" was captured by Nadine Thompson.

The most popular, sasr r fartftraff

By popular vote it was found that the best camper was Shirley Cosper, the most popular, Jane Fowler; the healthiest girl, Jean Letson.

Rux Carter and Frances Leonard were also on duty throughout the week assisting in camp activities.

The federal appropriation for the U. S. Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1932 is $185,883,236, of which $109,405,000 is for roads, leaving only $76,478,236 for agriculture. This includes research, extension, regulatory work and all other work done by the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

MEMBERS OF CHURCH ARE HOSTS THURSDAY

Methodist Members Entertain Friday On Picnic At Yamakita

Members of the Methodist church were hosts to their friends on last Thursday afternoon, entertaining with a picnic, on the beautiful grounds at Yamakita.

Swimming and various contests were staged during the afternoon, but the "high spot" of the occasion was the hotly contested ball game played between the Roberts Bible Class and the Junior boys who are members of Mr. A. A. Lauderdale's class.

The batteries for the two teams were Wales Wallace, Jr., and Wales Carter for the Bible Class and Tony Gilmore, Keener Roberts and Frank Ellis for the Lauderdale foes. The young Americans suffered defeat at the hands of the "older boys" who won the game by a score of 4 to 2. About 300 enjoyed this delightul event.

A picnic lunch and water melon cutting ended the day in a most satisfactory manner.

LEGION OFFICERS INSTALLED AT MONDAY NIGHT MEETING

The American Legion Chapter of Shelby County held its regular meeting at the Courthouse on Monday night. The following officers were installed: Nathan Gordon, Commander and Birk Wingard Adjustant. Mr. J. C. Neil gave a full report of the State meeting of the Legionnaires held in Gadsden last week.

ALABAMA DEMOCRATS PLAN CAMPAIGN FOR TICKET IN NOVEMBER

Despite Wet Democratic Platform Very Little Bolting From Party Ranks Is Expected

Alabama democrats plan an organized campaign to pile up a heavy majority for the party's national ticket in November.

With this end in view, a number of leading Democrats of the State met in Montgomery during the week end and took steps to set up campaign headquarters there and in Birmingham.

Tentative plans place Will Hill in charge of Montgomery headquarters and Jerome T. Fuller, Centerville, in charge of the North Alabama drive. Both men attended the conference in Montgomery.

The group included Judge Leon McCord, Montgomery, national committeeman; Mrs. A. Y, Malone, Dothan, national committeewoman; Edmund W. Pettus, Selma, chairman, Alabama Democratic Executive Committee; William C. Fitts, Birmingham and J. L. Bugg, Monroeville, Roosevelt leaders in the preliminary delegate race.

Sentiment expressed in the meeting was that Alabama will be for the Democratic ticket without a doubt in November, but every effort should be made to pile up a good majority for the party nominee as proof the state has repented of its near-faction in 1928, when barely a 51 per cent of the vote cast for the Smith-Robinson ticket.

There will be very little bolting of the ticket this year despite the wet plank of the Democratic platform, it is believed, as prohibitionists will want to keep their party standing clear for later elections on possible delegates to a prohibition convention.

ALABAMA TO BENEFIT BY FEDERAL HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION WORK

Bill Contains Provision That No Convict Labor Be Used On Construction Projects

When Secretary Hyde apportioned the $120,000,000 provided by the emergency construction of federal-aid highway system, Saturday, he thereby furnished employment to thousands of men whose families have fallen into desperate circumstances.

Differing from the usual requirements of similar appropriations, it is not essential that states match this fund. Instead, the monies obtained through the relief bill may be used to match the annual federal aid.

The $120,000,000 is to be repaid over a period of ten years beginning in 1933 by regular deductions from regular federal-aid apportionments.

The act also provides that all contracts involving the expenditure of the emergency funds shall contain provisions under which state highway departments will determine minimum wages to be paid.

No convict labor may be employed n construction work paid for by the emergency funds and no more than a 30-hour week is to be in effect. The act gives preference to ex-service men for jobs.

Among the allotment move were the following:

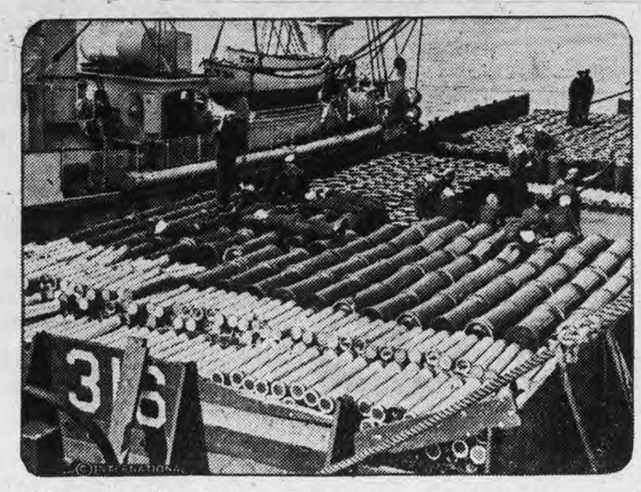
Alabama $2,558,229; Arkansas, $2,101,882; Florida, $1,624,752; Georgia, $8,123,298; Louisiana, $1,-745,559; Mississippi $2,160,164; North Carolina $$2,888251; South Caroline, $1,666,755; Tennessee, $2,-605,160, Virginia, $2,256,178.

A CORRECTION

The Democrat wishes to take this opportunity of expressing to its readers regret that a typographical error was made in one of the price lists appearing in the Max Kanter, Inc., advertisement last week.

If you will turn to the double page entitled "LET'S JOIN HANDS IN SHELBY COUNTY", you will notice, in the left hand top corner another advertisement of Mr. Kanter's in which appears the correct cost of the dress prints which was misquoted in last week's issue.

Sleeping on Gunpowder Containers



Sailors of the United States navy are here seen sleeping on gunpowder containers, but they are not so reckless as they seem to be. The containers are empty and are being removed from the U. S. S. California following the recent target practice off the California coast. They are sent to various naval ammunition depots to be refilled and returned to the ships for future firings.

BUILDS ROCKET TO REACH 500,000 FEET

After Many Failures, Experimenter Will Try Again.

Los Angeles.—A persistent watch repairman, whose attempts to escape the earth's gravitational forces by means of self-invented rockets have left a string of failures from Germany to the center of the Mojave desert, is building another machine. He is confident this one will reach an altitude of 500,000 feet.

The inventor, Maurice Poirier, Glendale jeweler's assistant, whose first rocket exploded on its launching in Germany in 1919, believes his newest 9-foot bullet-shaped contrivance will be the forerunner of a larger machine capable of crossing the American continent in five hours.

Poirier, who gained considerable attention in 1930 when he launched a rocket designed to reach the moon from the Mojave desert, said his new rocket would be propelled by a secret gas distilled from weeds grown in a small section of Germany. His 1930 rocket sputtered a short distance into the air and was shattered by an explosion.

Flew Rocket Three Times.

In 1925 he completed a small contrivance, propelled by gunpowder, and successfully flew it for ten miles on three separate occasions. At a public showing the rocket with a great hissing noise left the ground, only to fall back, burying itself with terrific force.

His new rocket, costing about $25,000, is being constructed in a secret machine shop somewhere in Los Angeles. He says it will not carry wings, but will resemble a bullet 9 feet long with "fenders" on both sides.

It will carry oxygen tanks, he said, to permit the gas to explode under normal earth conditions.

To Release Parachute.

The final blast of gas, Poirier said, will release a parachute designed to carry the exhausted rocket back to earth. Scientific instruments to record atmospheric conditions in the stratosphere and the mysterious layer of ionized gases which lies beyond will be contained in the rocket, he said.

Poirier, owner of a Canadian ranch on which he hopes to grow the weeds from which his fuel gas is distilled, says he dreams of perfecting, eventually, a rocket capable of maintaining a speed of 25,000 miles an hour.

In explaining the weed gas, Poirier said it was discovered by accident by a German druggist's helper, who sought to fill a prescription and joined the two chemicals by error. The inventor said the weed gas contacting another chemical makes a more powerful explosive than any other yet known.

He intends to launch the new rocket sometime this summer.

Many Persons "Blind" to Touch, Expert Finds

Columbus, Ohio.—If you are color blind, or tone deaf, don't feel badly, because there are some people who are "blind" to the sense of touch, according to Dr. Laurence H. Snyder, professor of zoology and entomology at Ohio State university.

Persons of this last group are unable to distinguish the shape of an object by handling or touching it, Doctor Snyder says, even though the object is perfectly round or square.

The scientist has been able to make experiments by placing a box of blocks of assorted shapes on one side of a screen so that his subject is unable to see them.

ABSENCE AND AFFECTION

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Emeritus Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

"Absence makes the heart grow fonder," the poet said, and when we repeat the lines we generally have in mind young lovers whom chance or duty or some other influence has for a time kept apart. It is possibly true of those sentimentally drawn to each other, but a poet sees into the inner workings of the emotions more deeply than do ordinary men, and I am sure he had in mind other people and other situations, than mere youth falling in love. Absence gives us time to think out the meaning of scenes and relationships which before, perhaps, we have never had time to realize the meaning or the importance of. It might be a good thing for all of us if for a time we could get away from the people with whom we are in daily relationship, or the business or the scenes which may have become to us quite commonplace.

Mrs. Gray goes off by herself at least once a year and leaves her husband to look after himself. There is nothing sinister in this, nothing which indicates domestic irregularity or discontent. The Grays are really very devoted to each other, but sitting across the table from each other three times a day for at least twenty-eight days in the month, there develops in time monotony. Mrs. Gray wants a change; she likes, for a week or two, to plan her own affairs, to be by herself, to think her own thoughts. She comes back refreshed, stimulated, more in love with her home and her husband than she has ever been before. She says that husbands and wives and children sometimes see too much of each other and so grow tired each of the other. Maybe there is something in it.

One never so fully appreciates his own country until he has visited another and has seen the conditions under which citizens of other lands exist. The man who comes into New York harbor from a trip abroad and does not feel a thrill of happiness and appreciation such as he has never felt before, as he sees the statue of Liberty and the Stars and Stripes flying, is a hopelessly dull and stupid soul. It is good for a man for a time to be absent from his country.

Gem Rush on in Archipelago

Pacific Island Is Famed for Black Pearls.

Washington.—At the apex of prosperity the single article most sought by the world of fashion was the black pearl, of which the finest specimens came from the Paumotu archipelago.

Twenty fathoms deep in the South Pacific brown-skinned divers searched amid the coral for the black-lipped shells that house the great prize.

Annually there was a "pearl rush" from Papeete to the hidden atolls where the mother-of-pearl shells for distant button factories offered a certain income, while a chance lucky find of a big black pearl meant fabulous wealth. Millionaire yachtsmen charted their course to the sun-kissed atolls, first familiarized by bride's pendant or black pearl earrings.

Ten years ago one could learn of the Paumotu islands—known also as the Tuamotu archipelago—only from pilots' charts and half recondite books of South sea lore. Now there are a dozen books, by tired business men, college boys, high seas racketeers, and Gov. Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania, which tell of their palms, pearls, and soft trade breezes.

The Paumotu, or Taumotu, archipelago is situated about 4,500 miles southwest from Panama. It comprises about 100 island and islets, in total area 330 square miles, scattered over 1,000 miles of ocean expanse. The population is variously estimated from 3,500 to 5,000, chiefly Polynesians, but in the black pearl days including also numerous Europeans, Americans, and Asiatics.

Because of the uniformly low elevation of the Paumotu coral isles, usually only 15 to 45 feet above the sea, they are known to mariners as the "Low" or "Dangerous" archipelago, and countless ships have dashed to pieces on unlighted reefs.

The islands were discovered in 1601 by the Spanish navigator Piedro Fernandez Quiros, and after centuries of indeterminate status were occupied by France in the middle of the Nineteenth century and annexed in 1881. They are administered, with other French possessions in the eastern Pacific, as a dependency, with administrative headquarters at Papeete, Tahiti.

As the valuable black pearls are rarely discovered, the more certain income depends on commercial lots of small pearls and cargoes of mother-of-pearl shell. Prosperity, therefore, depends to a considerable extent upon the status of the button trade in America, which affords a market for the shell.

RAMBLING REMARKS

There is one thing certain about a small town; a woman living in one oes not get a chance to lie about er age.

The school situation all over the te is in a serious state. Alabama the only state, according to auth-ties, that hasn't made some pro-ion for her schools to keep open d teachers to be paid enough salary ch month to live on. We should ot expect a teacher to pay 8 per cent on money to live on and then have nothing but warrants at face value which may or may not be good for a red copper cent at any time.

The hitch hiker sure will give you a cussing when you pass his signaling thumb, but we are of the opinion that it is better to have a cussing, that you don't hear, than it is to have a rap over the head and your car and money taken.

COMMONPLACE ACCIDENTS CAUSE OF MANY DEATHS

Falling downstirs out of bed, and over broom handles and buckets may be droll accidents in most cases, but they caused the death of almost 1,800 women last year.

This was revealed recently by Miss Margaret Bondfield to women's ses-sion of the National Safety congress held in London.

The session was considering the problem of "Safety in the Home."

Figures presented to the congress (those of 1930, the latest vailable) showed that falling downstirs cost the lives of 675 persons, falling out of windows took 135 more, while falling from bed sent no less than 58 into the hereafter.

The Michigan Farmer says that "with the decline in the consumption of meat products the corn grower is needing new outlets for his grain. Chemists have found that corn sugar can be successfully used in the manu-facture of condensed milk and also in the making of carbonated beverages. These two uses would give a possible demand for nearly forty million bushels of corn."

HOW GREAT IS OUR STATE OF ALABAMA?

"And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

I am sure that each of you recalls the substance of the major speeches of the most successful politicians of this State for the past twenty-five years. The politicians spell-binder never say a cloudy day if his audience were interested in fair weather, and he never caught a glimpse of sun-shine if the campaign were pitched on the issues of adversity.

I am sure that all of you will really something like this as the warm-up remarks of the average opening cam-paign speech: "It is wonderful to live in this great and glorious State—a State that has been the home of my honored forbears for more than a hundred years. This is a glorious State where all of our men are lead-ers, and all of our women are young and beautiful. It is a joy to live in a favored land where the sun shines throughout nearly all the days and the moon and stars bedeck the heav-ens with the charm of our own Sou-thern colors by night; where the birds sing more sweetly than the sweetest birds of Paradise, and where every rippling stream is a joyous song and every babbling brook a lov-ely poem. The Greek Philosopher Roman Senator were men of mean attainments when compared with our own great average citizen. The Maids of Athens were as clumsy hus-sies when compared with the grace and beauty of even our most unlove-ly women. Man for man, we can lick the whole discovered world. We can build a fence around this great commonwealth of ours and live lav-ishly and happily while less favored states and nations starve because we do not give them of our waste. Our banks are the strongest, our bank-ers, the wisest, our merchants the keenest, and our farmers the most thrifty in all the wide wide world. From the laughing waters of the snow-clad hills above the Tennessee to the sweet orange blossoms that make fragrant the warm waters of the Gulf, and from the fertile fields of North, East, South and West Ala-bama springs the conquering race of this proud State, as they take ov-er the leadership of the Universe. We are a people divinely blessed by the God of our worthy fathers—a people proud in our superiority—a people free from prejudice, ignor-ance and poverty. It is good to be honored with a citizenship in a State so rich and prosperous and so filled with opportunities and so blessed with opportunities and so blessed with attainments and successes that come to the strong and the worthy."—

"I am sure that what I have said is no great exaggeration of what you have so often heard. We must all be ready to admit that we have been too much fed up on political pap. We have been too easily lulled to sleep by the bed time stories of the wily self-appointed leader or the bus-iness opportunist. Slogans and slams, suggestions and slurs, promises and propaganda, moonshine and mush have caught the imagination of our people and enthroned the hand-shak-ing office-seeker and left us in this day and generation struggling to solve problems that are beyond the best of us.

Maybe the time has come when the demand is made upon all of us to face a few undisputed facts and keep these facts well in mind.

This is a large State—third to the largest state east of the Mississippi River. We have no foreign blood alibi to hold us back in our develop-ment. We have a good climate and a fairly equable rainfall and we come from a good stock of sturdy Ameri-can blood. We really have many natural resources and we are well located geographically, and the to-pography of our State invites easy development. The time has come, however, when we may ask one an-other what have we really accomp-lished?

First—we are an iliterate people. You do not resent this any more than I resent it, but the Press of Alabama is honest and intelligent enough to face facts. Taken as a whole, and it is the whole that makes the State, we are dreadfully illiterate. Separate our negroes from the rest of the population—and we can't do this no matter how much we may wish to do so—and we are still illiterate. Only Louisiana, South Carolina, Ken-tucky, Tesnessee and Virginia are as low in white illiteracy as is our own good state.

"We are a people of fairly good health, but we owe that to two or three outstanding health officers and the Rockefeller Foundation.

"We are a poor people—we are pitifully poor—and the average man really has practically nothing to call his own. We have about the heav-iest bonded indebtedness in propor-tion to our wealth of any state in the Union, while we have the lowest per capita wealth of all the states. We have the lowest per capita agri-cultural earning capacity of any State, and the smallest number of mercantile establishments per one thousand people of any State. Only one state purchases less per capita than Alabama.

"While we boast of the lowest per capita advalorem tax, we literally bog down in illiteracy and poverty. May-be it is an unbalanced State and poor people rather than a progressive State and a prosperous people than has been in the making.

We provide stadiums for college boys, but we have no room for our insane and feeble minded who are confined in jails, shut up in homes or deprived of the care that we owe our unfortunates.

We have no State T. B. Hospital, and few of our counties and cities have charity hospitals or similar in-stitutions to be found in other States. Our textile plants, lumber camps, and saw mills, as well as our rubber plants and garment factories, pay the lowest wage scale paid to laborers in the occupations.

"We have a state-owned port with-out profitable commerce, and state-owned bridges that do not pay the interest on investments. With tre-mendous road bond issues and heavy gasoline taxes we are at a stand-still in the construction of public high-ways.

"We have a larger percentage of our population of school age than any other state except Arkansas. This makes a great problem for the com-paratively few men who pay taxes to educate the large number of chil-dren. Maybe we are rich in children, but I am wondering if too many of our children are not poor in the op-portunities provided them by their State.

It is certainly not pleasant to tell the truth to the Alabama Press As-sociation, and yet it is upon the truth that we must build a better State.

72 per cent of our population is still rural, nearly 60 per cent of it being actual farm rural population. As I have stated, we have the low-est per capita wealth of any State in the Union, and decidedly the lowest percapita agricultural wealth. The buildings on Alabama farms, including homes, barns, and outhouses of every kind and description, average in val-ue but a little more than $500,000, the lowest of any State.

"Alabama has a land area of near-ly 33,000,000 acres, but we have on-ly one cow of every kind and des-cription to every 40 acres; only one hog to every 40 acres, and but one chicken to every 5 acres.

"We buy from beyond our State borders nearly $20,000,000.44 worth of dairy products each year—more than 75 per cent of the beef we con-sume—more than 76 per cent of the pork, and more than 95 per cent of the lamb. Yet there are those who cannot understand why we have the lowest per capita agricultural wealth of any State. For 1930 our agricul-tural per capita income was but $65.-00—only $8.00 of which came from livestock. The agricultural per capi-ta income of Iowa was $365.00—$320.00 of which came from live-stock; Minnesota $225.00—$205.00 of which came from livestock.

"The chart that I have placed with each of you tells the whole story and reflects the need of diversification on the Alabama farms by the use of such livestock as is adapted to each particular farm.

"Let us consider a few more facts. The average amount of mortgage debt per farm acre in Alabama is $12.40. Do you honestly think the average farm in Alabama would sell for $12.40 today.

The average value of cattle per acre in Alabama is about $1.00—the acerage value of hogs per acre is 25c—the average value of poultry per acre in Alabama is about 8c. With an average farm debt per acre of $12.40, our combined value per acre of cattle, hogs, and poultry is $1.33. The average tax per acre for 1929 was 25c and the ratio of changes to the debt is 7.29 per cent.

"When values were high in 1929 the average farm mortgage was 28.11 per cent of the farm value. The debt has no declined, but farm values have declined distressingly.

If 72 per cent of our people are rural, then we must find out some way to increase the earning power, spending power, and debt-poying power of this large portion of our population. I doubt if any one thinks this can be done by raising more cotton at this particular time.

"Since June 1st there has been very little change in the price of cot-ton, but good cattle have advanced 1 and one-half cents per pound, and hogs 2 and one-half a pound. This increase, even with our distressingly small number of cattle and hogs, has added nearly $5,000,000.00 annually to farm values in Alabama. If we had only one cow to every ten acres, one hog to every five acres, and only one chicken to every one acre, this increase alone in the price of cattle, hogs and poultry would have added more than $25,000,000.00 annually to our farm values during the past six weeks.

It is plain that I am attempting to challenge the interest of you men who represent the best thought of our people, and to ask you to turn aside from theory, pseudo pholosophy highbrow psychology, and get down to every-day meat and bread com-mon-sense that we may together de-vise some means by which we may lift our State to a higher level of prosperity.

"I am sure that we must find some way, and not by Government aid, to extend safe and conservative credit to the Alabama farmers, so that they may diversify their farming methods with the use of more livestock on the farm.

"I am equally sure that we must demand more efficiency and more economy in every form of Govern-ment. We will not secure these re-forms by harsh criticisms or person-al abuse, but rather by cooperation and dignified demands upon those in authority.

We cannot educate our people to the need of improved conditions if we submit to the closing of our schools and the balancing of our bud-get at the expense of a childhood that already is deprived of the aver-age educational apportunities.

"Economy, efficiency, and educa-tion go hand in hand. The Press is the great power that can mold public opinion to an acceptance of our needs and a realization of the immediate necessity of being definite, positive and forceful in our efforts to bring about an adjustment of unbalanced conditions and the development of those agencies that are necessary for the growth and progress of our State.

If I have not told you how very welcome you are to our good city and how glad we are to have you with us, it is simply because I know that you know this already and that we are all more interested in accom-plishing something worthwhile than indulging in a lot of useless and un-necessary flattery. Anyway, we are delighted that Montgomery has the honor to entertain the Alabama Press Association. We hope that you will do very little work while you are here, but that you will give us an opportunity to enjoy you and that you will enjoy your two days with us."

MRS. HEBSON HONORED BY MRS. JACK SALTER

Mrs. Jack Salter entertained in honor of Mrs. Edwin Hebson-nee Miss Antoinette Christian from Columbi-ana on Tuesday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Zallie Cowart in Calera at a beautiful Bridge party. Guests from Sylacauga, Montevallo, Calera and Columbiana enjoyed this delight-ful courtesy. Mrs. Salter and Mrs. Hebson were college mates at Ala-bama College.

A THOUGHT FOR TODAY

We are now nearing the end of the depression and I am still rich. My $200,000 eyes are just as good as they ever were. Every landscape and sunset is mine if I want it. A $100,000 sense of hearing is still un-impaired and by it I become heir to a world of beauty and inspiration. Then there's my $1,000,000 stomach and a half-million dollar appetite—no doctor has sentenced me to spin-ach for the rest of my life. The de-pression has not lowered the value of a single friendship. Neighbors still greet us in the same old cordial way; business associates believe in us; our sons hold us in high respect; the wife's welcome at the close of the day has not depreciated. The prayers my mother taught me and the faith in God instilled in me by a devout father remain as priceless treasures no depression can touch.—Roy L. Smith in the Rotarian.

Dr. S. L. Thetford of Boligee, Greene County, has found Austrian peas to make a splendid pasture for early spring. They saved him a lot on his dairy cows in the spring of 1931. While being grazed the peas made a good growth.

Alabama has 6 per cent more pigs than last year but the farmers of the nation have 7 per cent less, re-ports F. W. Gist, statistician for the Department of Agriculture.

"The total number of pigs in the State this year is 414,000 against 391,000 last year and 411,000 in 1931", he said.

"It is estimated that the number of sows to be farrowed this fall will be 66,000 which is the same as were farrowed last fall."

"ISOLATION" GONE MAD

"During the past twelve months voices have been heard . . . to the effect that foreign trade is a negligible factor in the restoration of our domestic prosperity. . . Ninety-five per cent of our existing business is domestic, they say, why not face the fact and center upon the home market? And so they advocate a closer drawing of the curtains about the great expanse of the United States, they contend for yet higher barriers to exclude the goods of other lands. This is the philosophy of economic 'defeatism.' It is 'isolation' gone mad. It has no more justification economically than the advocacy of a return to the era of the kerosene lamp and the four-wheel buggy. . . Despite the attractiveness of our domestic market, it must be remembered that 92 per cent of the world's population lives outside the United States and is poorly supplied with the things we best produce. Our international position today demands more analysis, more careful consideration and greater dependence upon facts than ever before in the history of our commerce."

This is the opinion of an author on international trade. And it is an opinion that is gradually finding its echo in the minds of the general public. People are starving when we have wheat to burn; people are cold when wool and cotton are a drug on the American market. Only by an intelligent interchange of goods between nations can commercial stability and prosperity be attained. If we shut out foreign goods for which our people offer a market, we will be shut out of their markets—either by foreign retaliatory tariffs, or because their people have no money with which to buy. The demise of our international trade would mean the loss of livelihood, directly, of several million American families, and work a great hardship on many millions more. Stimulated foreign trade is, to a greater degree than most of us yet realize, a vital factor in the solution of our domestic difficulties.

THE FUNDAMENTAL CAUSE

In a recent address on the milk problem— which is very similar to that of other farm products—the president of the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association said that there are three major causes for low prices. Two of these are overproduction and drop in consumption. The third, the havoc wrought in sales by independent dealers dumping milk on the market, can be remedied by cooperative action.

Overproduction and decreased consumption are temporary problems, felt by almost all business at this time. They will cure themselves when the economic clauds roll by. But no matter how good business conditions in general become, the farmer will not prosper as long as he persists in doing business alone in competition with highly developed distributing organizations which can make their own terms. Only by joining with thousands of other farmers and perfecting organizations which can meet distributors on the same grounds, can his condition be permanently improved.

A fair price for milk to the farmer does not mean a high price to the consumer. At present, in many acreas, the distributor's profit is as much per gallon as ever—the entire burden has been passed on to the farmer, who is the least able to bear it. Strong cooperatives benefit the public at large, by employing men, by aiding transport systems, by putting money into circulation, by stimulating new developments. The cooperative movement is the farmer's insurance against the future—and its success will be felt in every business, every state, every community.

THE LURE OF SPEED

Speed, while one of the blessings of modern life, is also one of its greatest curses. Applied to industry, transportation and commerce, it has advanced civilization to a point where life, while infinitely more complex, seems easier to live.

Yet the benefits of speed have been attended by serious disadvantages, especially as applied to the modern automobile. Statistics of the National Bureau of Casualty and Surety Underwriters show that 15 per cent of all automobile accident fatalities are caused by excessive speed. Last year 3,920 persons were killed and 76,500 injuries in 67,080 accidents because of it. What part of all the other accidents which happen daily can be attributed to speeding, is open to conjecture.

What, then, is a reasonable and fair speed? The answer is subject to change even as conditions are. Jas. A. Beha, General Manager of the National Bureau of Casualty and Surety Underwriters, says: "Police enforcement authorities should consider all speeds over 45 miles an hour on public highways as approaching the danger point. While in some cases it is not necessary to enforce discipline for speeds faster than which may be considered as generally unreasonable."

It is pleasing to note that automobile manufacturers and makers of automobile equipment and accessories are joining forces with safety organizations to stress "safety" rather than speed as the goal to be obtained. Modern conditions have changed the attitudes of these manufacturers and for the lure of speed they are now substituting the concrete value of safety, in their advertising.

POLITICS AND PERSONALITIES

With bonus veterans milling around the Capitol, Vice-President Curtis had ordered 60 Marines to the scene. Senator Hiram Bingham of Connecticut tried vainly to get Mr. Hoover to countermand the order. "I don't want to be drawn into this mess," was the response of the Commander-inChief of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps.

Last minute deliberations of the House and Senate were shrouded in secrecy. Fearful of more violent demonstrations, President Hoover cancelled an intended trip to the Capitol to sign final bills. For the first time in recent years the iron gates of the White House grounds were locked; the beacon light on the Capitol was kept burning so that the watching veterans might not know that the representatives of the people had ceased their deliberations at 11:30 Saturday night. Departures of members were kept secret. Instead of appearing on the Capitol plaza, some scurried to their waiting sedans by the underground railroad to the office buildings. It was even rumored that Speaker Garner boarded the train for Uvalde, Texas, at a secret stop.

But Congress has labored. While at times resembling a Cave of the Winds, it has brought forth much constructive legislation of an emergency character. It created the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation; passed the Glass-Stegall Act broadening Federal Reserve discount powers; enlarged Federal Land Bank capital; passed a tax bill raising more revenue than any since the war; passed the Norris anti-injunction measure and outlawed "yellow dog" contracts; passed the proposal to abolish lame duck sessions of Congress; defeated the big navy advocates in the Senate who voted to build up our navy to the strength to which it was "reduced" by the London Naval Conference.

Much remains for the December session. Never before was it so evident that we need a Congress which is continually on the job.—Tuskegee News.

THUNDER ABOVE

We could do well to exchange a thousand politicians for even one statesman, thundered Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler in an address recently before the Advertising Federation of America.

Dr. Butler is never afraid to voice his views whether this be on the fact that the Democratic party, which he opposes, possesses the all of American intellectual and political stamina, criticism of the Hoover administration, a clarion call for repeal or the "international mind" as in the present instance.

Countries whose chief educators are in a position to voice high views and idealism are generally led safely across the shoals of their times.

We ought to be glad that we have Dr. Butler to help point the way.

Speaking of world leadership, he said:

"The chief burden of responsibility must rest upon Washington and Paris because the United States and France are the world's outstanding creditor nations and are both economically and psychologically in position to take the lead in repairing this broken world. Washington is more particularly to blame because it has not the temptation which besets the French people to remember the fact that their territory has provided the chief battleground of European wars for several years. The American people have no such excuse to offer."

Even so—true though what he says undoubtedly is—Dr. Butler must bide his time because this nation can not afford now to trust itself to additional blunders on the part of the Washington administration.

There is not that mental girth and breadth among present rulers requisite to meet such grave issues as those that face the "international mind."

International good will, in short, is too large a problem for the Republican intellect to grasp.

It is better when directed by shallow minds rather to endure the ills we have than to fly to others we know not of.—Clarksdale (Miss) Register.

OUT AMONG THE DERELICTS

While in Chicago attending the Democratic National Convention the writer left the hotel lobbies which were filled with politicians and the leaders of the party—a place where the conditions of our people were discussed in the abstract—and went out in the slums of that great city to observe conditions among the unfortunates of Chicago.

There we witnessed sights that made our heart sick.

We saw humanity in all its despondency, its distress, its loss of hope.

We saw strong men—thousands of them, the great army of the unemployed—tramping the streets of that great city.

We saw men sitting about with their faces in their hands, objects of dejection and despondency. Jobs gone. Hope gone, all because of the exploiting of this country and this government by the selfish interests who have been in control of its affairs during the past twelve years.

We saw men tramping the streets with their coats under their arms, taut faces, dejected and despondent.

We saw men sitting about on curbs rows and rows of them, suffering in silence. No job. Nowhere to go, and not knowing where their next meal would come from.

We talked with some of them. Many had given up hope. Many were living in hope of better days and better times.

It was a distressing experience, and one that will long be remembered.

We came back to the hotel where people had lost the common touch. Where the leaders who run this government know little of the suffering of the toiling millions of this country.

We thought that if they knew more of these conditions, and came more in contact with them that there would be a different attitude in the government at Washington.

The people of this country, the toiling millions, are not seeking help from the government. They don't want a paternalistic government.

The people of this nation are crying for the opportunity of earning an honest living in the sweat of their faces. This is all they ask.

Unless the powerful and plundering interests of this country loose their hold on the government, and let it function freely and justly in the interest of the welfare of the people of this nation, serious trouble is going to ensue.

Such scenes as we witnessed at Chicago are being enacted every day in the great industrial and concentrated population centers of this country, and these people must have relief.

Yes, it made our heart sick when we left the milling throngs in the hotel lobbies and went out among the milling thousands in the slums of the great city of Chicago.—Commercial (Miss) Dispatch.

A BIG MISTAKE

We believe that the present world condition is due to an error. We are not wise enough to say what the error is or who was guilty of making it. There is really no reason for the world being in the condition it is now in. The human race since it has been wise enough to build this civilization and standard of living should be wise enough to manage it. As late as five years ago this nation was riding on the top of a wave of prosperity. Mills and factories and industries were operating at full capacity, workmen were employed and farmers were receiving good prices. Something went awry. Today mills and industries and factories are closed or are working on part time and farm values are at a low point. The business world is at a stand still and man, its creator, seems helpless to suggest a remedy or to apply one. It appears we have yet much to learn in the management of our business.

In bragging of the good, old days, it is well to remember that they date back to the time before screens were in vogue and that a part of the morning ritual at breakfast was to retrieve the flies from semi-fluid butter and the molasses pitcher.—Northwest Alabamian.

AUTOMOBILE LICENSE COLORS

White and blue is the color scheme selected for Alabama automobile license tags for 1933 with letters and numerals on a blue background. A sufficient number of these tags to meet all needs, will be manufactured at the State tag factory at Kilby Prison, for distribution to Probate Judges for issuance at the proper time.

Automobile license is due in this state October 1, and becomes delinquent on November 15, following.

News and Views

By THOMAS W. PRIMM

Once upon a time a man offered a horse for sale and claimed that it was five years old. The year was 1906. The deal was about concluded when the prospective buyer asked if the horse had a name. Yes, the name of the steed was Cuba. That settled it. The buyer knew instantly that the horse trader had lied about the horse's age. He knew the horse was every bit of eight years old because no one would ever think of naming a horse Cuba save in or about the year 1898 when the Spanish American War was brought on over the issue of Cuba.

In the same manner people oftimes have their ages attached to them like labels along with their names because there seems to be some irrestible compulsion laid upon certain classes of parents to affix to their offspring the name of an individual or an event contemporaneous with the date of birth of the child. A goodly proportion of the twins born in the course of the last two years have been named Amos and Andy as inevitably as the night follows the day and never will they be able to falsify their ages. Such names are a surer date mark than any sworn birth certificate, any pass port data, or even the family Bible or parish register.

If those sibyls, clad in eastern robes, who contemplate gazing globes emitting imitations of future happenings can furnish you with the given names of the children born in the next year after election, especially in the next month after election, you can place any amount of money that the man bearing the name most in use at that future date will be elected President of the United States. If the successful candidate is Herbert Hoover of alifornia, there will be a descent of Herberts in waddling clothes. There will even be numbers of Huberts. If Governor Roosevelt wins, the number of infant Franklins will be legion. If, in a dream of the future of the next three or four years, you hear apettish voice yelling "Garner, take your hands out of that jam," you'll know that the Speaker of the House has been elected vice-president.

Women probably, are the most embarrassed by this lack of restraint on the part of their parents. Fond parents, newly rich in the possession of a baby daughter and enthusiastic in their support of some rostrum pounder, will fling to the winds all thought of the days perhaps 35 years in the future, when their daughter is spinning out a reluctant spinsterhood. They will name her after an event so current that not all the oaths she could swear would subtract one year from her number of summers.

There are plenty of feminine names which are timeless but, somehow, parents continue to fall into the trap of the immediate. Helen lived so many centuries ago and stirred up so much trouble that her name has become a dateless symbol; it is more of a warning. Mary, too, has no date stamped on her brow. Elizabeth somehow, belongs to the ages now. But produce a woman today whose name is Victoria and whose mother's name was not and the chances are almost 100 to 1 that the Old Queen of England had not ceased to breathe before this one began.

The period of popularity of certain works of literature is sufficient to date a great many people. Of all the Lucile's and Mauds in the English-speaking world today it is pretty safe to say that half of them date back to the heyday of Lord Tennyson and Owen Meredith. To be sure there are daughters named after their mothers or after rich aunts but if there is any doubt about the age, if the years seem to be debatable, it is a safe bet that the authentic birth goes back to contemporary life.

Such a book, for example as that of Ouida turned forth on the earth an avalanche of Ouidas whoh might as well have been dated conspicuously with a purple-inked rubber stamp. When the Winning of Barbara Worth" was a best seller, a bevy of Barbaras was sprung. Janice Meredith," the novel, was godmother to innumerable Janices, while "Beverly of Graustark" had an amazing progeny. Those little children who came into the world with the name Dorothy already fitted to them are as surely indicated as the copyright dateline indicates the year of publication of "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall."

The names given the lads are more likely to be political or military. The number of Theodores is huge, all dating from Theodore Roosevelt. Since the World War there has been a crop of Pershings and, later still, the nurseries have been crowded with Lindberghs in the shape of either a first or middle name. The number of Alfred Emanuels is large.

The place name is of magnificent interest. There are two outstanding examples. The father of one of America's leading citizens of today was in command of federal troops during the Civil War when, in a rift in the battle smoke, he was reached by a message from home announcing the birth of a son. Without an instant of indecision he thereupon dubbed that child Kenesaw Mountain Landis for the detonations around him sprang from the ordnance fighting that battle.

In precisely the same way General O. O. Howard was in the very thick of the fighthing in the Wilderness when informed of the birth of his son. The son's name automatically became Chancellorsville. Mr. Chancellorsville Howard lives in Washington today, an official of the government.

There was a period in American cultural development when it became the fashion for men to wear middle initials. A lot of men had none. They merely adopted a meaningless initial which sounder euphonious, particularly in relation to the first name. If a good many men of from 50 to 80 years of age have a middle initial, the chances are investigation would prove it stands for nothing, unless a tag has since been invented for it. These men took these initials themselves and they were grown at the time when two combinations of first name and initial shook the world. The first was John D. and the second John L. Anyone who required the names of Rockefeller and Sullivan to be supplied argued himself uninformed. So a lot of rising young men felt that they stood a better chance of fame if known as Henry M. than as just Henry and in went the arbitrary initial.

Initials and whole names moult in some cases. There are few persons who would not pause before identifying Thomas Woodrow Wilson as President of the United States and even Herbert Clark Hoover we knew as food administrator looks queer beside the plain Herbert Hoover of today.

Parents desiring to let their children keep their own counsel in later years would do well to name them Mary and Martha or Moses or John. Beware of dated names.

An egg yolk has vitamins A, B, C, D, and G, and a large amount of phosphorus, iron, and some copper, needed for building blood. It is a highly desirable food.

Says WILL ROGERS

BEVERLY HILLS—Say any of you that have kids in schools, either grammar, high or College, it dont make any difference, but can any of you parents get head or tail of what they are doing, what they are taking, what they are learning? This modern education gag has sure got me licked, I cant tell from talking to em what its all about. All the kids I know, either mine or anybodys, none of em can write so you can read it, none of em can spell so you can read it, cant figure and dont know geography, but they are always taking some of the darndest things, political science, international relations, drama, buck dancing, sciocology, latin, greek art, Oh Lord the things they go in for runs on by the hour!

But its as I say, not only our brood, but none of em that I have seen can write, spell, figure, or tell you what bounds Corea. Everybody has swimming pools, but nobody has got a plain old geography. Gymnasiums to the right of you, and tennis courts to the left of you, but not a spelling book in a car load of schools.

Then they got another gag they call "Credits". If you do anything thirty minutes twice a week, why you get some certain "Credit". Maby its lamp shade tinting, maby its singing, maby its a thing they call "Music Appreciation", that used to drive my cowboy son Jim pretty near "Nuts". He never could see how that would aid you to rope a calf. They give out these things at schools for anything that anyone can think of. Some of em you get more "Credits" than for others. If a thing is particularily useless why it gives you more credits. There is none at all for the things that we thought constituted "School".

You could write, read, spell, figure, and give the capitol of Rhode Island, and they wouldent give you a "Credit" in a year. But you tell where a Latin word was originally located, and how its been manhandled and orphandised down to the present day, and say they will claim that you have the nucleus of a "Thesis", and you are liable to get a horde of "Credits". Now who cares about the word, or what it has contributed to the welfare of Nations that never minds to them.

You have got yourself the family tree of a word. Course you cant go out and get a job on it, but these old proffessors value it mighty highly. Some of these days they are going to remove so much of that "Bunk and Hooey" and the thousands of things that the schools have become clogged up with, and we will find that we can educate our broods for about one tenth the price and learn em something they might accidentally use after they escaped.

The smarter a nation gets the more wars it has. The dumb ones are too smart to fight. Our schools teach us what the other fellow knows, but it dont teach us anything new for ourselves. Everybody is learning just one thing, not because they will know more, but because they have been taught that they wont have to work if they are educated. Well we got so many educated now, that there is not enough jobs for educated people. Most of our work is skilled and requires practice, and not education.

But none of these big proffessors will come out and tell you that our education might be lacking, that it might be shortened, that it might be improved. They know as it is now that its a "Racket," and they are in on it. You couldent get me to admit that making movies was the bunk either. None of us will talk against our own graft. We all got us our "Rackets" nowadays.

There is just about as much "Hooey" in everything as there is merit. The heathern live with less effort, and less worry.

Trying to live "Past" our parents, and not "Up to Em" is one of our drawbacks, the old Chinese got the right idea along that line, but ever once in awhile some fellow does pop up and declare himself. Look at that college professor in Chicago University. He said our learning system was all haywire.

He is a smart guy. I heard him speak at a dinner in Chicago during the Convention. He knew a whole lot more than just where a lot of words "Come From." This education is just like everything else. You got to judge it by results. Here we are better educated (according to educational methods) than we ever were. And we are worse off than we ever were, so its not living up to its "Billing." Its overated. Its not worth the price.

Its costing us more than its worth. They got to devise some way of giving more for the money. All he is getting out with now is 'Credits" and nobody on the outside is cashing em.

Money? Plenty of It
Bloc Against U. S. A.
Shock for Best Minds
When Germany Is Ready

Washington wanted to sell $650,000,000 long-term treasury notes, some paying 2⅛, some 3½ per cent. One issue was subscribed for twelve times. The government could have had $5,506,000,000 instead of $650,000,000, almost ten times what it needed.

This shows that there is money in the country. Our banks, more heavily loaded with cash than ever before, don't know where to use their supplus money.

Karl H. von Wiegand cables from Berlin to Universal Service about the "anti-American bloc," just perfected in Europe. Germany has joined and it includes France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, Poland, Jugoslavia and Rumania.

Mr. Von Wiegand says "British Foreign Secretary Simon and Premier Herriott of France have planned to isolate the United States if Washington refuses to cancel war debts."

Boycotting is easy, sometimes unprofitable. Eight merchants might unite to boycott their best customer and not be happy when the customer stops buying.

Here is news to make our "best minds" ponder, muse and fret. Ponca City, Okla., according to the Associated Press, takes no taxes from its citizens, because it makes enough from publicly owned water and light plants to pay all city expenses, and this in spite of the fact that rates charged for water and light have been reduced twice in the last two years.

Stillwater, another Oklahoma city, is tax free, thanks to public ownership. In the state of Kansas, Chanute, Colby, Augusta and Beloit are, as you have been told, four tax-free cities.

Gen. Kurt von Schleicher, spokesman for the German war ministry, says, "Under the agreement at Geneva, Germany has a right to restore her fighting power and will do it unless other nations disarm."

Other nations will not disarm, therefore Germany undoubtedly will re-enter the list of fighting nations. You can imagine how some of the allies would feel should they suddenly find Germany and Italy united under energetic dictators.

What would this country answer if European countries thus menaced should come to us again saying, "Kindly oblige with ten billion more dollars and three million more men"?

The government has discovered a "Communist" plot to injure bank credits by a whispering campaign. It should be, but is not generally, known that saying, doing or insinuating anything to injure a bank's credit is a criminal offense.

However, the government and bankers should make sure that the "reds" are really the "whisperers."

Reds, as a rule, like something that explodes with a bang. They are not whisperers by nature. Some unscrupulous person short of stocks might be interested in promoting lack of confidence in banks.

Uncle Sam should send kind regards to Sir Atul Chatterjee, who leads India's delegation in the Ottawa conference. Sir Atul says he and the rest of India won't "buy everything inside the British empire" and buy nothing from the United States. India buys and sells in the outside world now $1,500,000,000 worth of products, 70 per cent outside the British empire, and doesn't intend to jeopardize her trade with the United States.

When men decide to die, usually a decision more or less cowardly, they do it in strange ways. One jumps into a volcano, taking a girl with him. Another goes over Niagara, some jump in front of locomotives, some hang, shoot or drown themselves. Roscoe Griffith went about it deliberately. To ambulance doctors, called by his wife, to find him eating a hasty dinner, he said: "My wife is mistaken, gentlemen; I have taken no poison." And he smiled.

They took him to the hospital. He walked from the ambulance to the door, and fell dead.

So many pleasant things can happen, so many interesting things are sure to happen, "gigantic troubles" melt so quickly, that it is silly not to wait as long as possible and see.

The great Rockefeller city development in the heart of New York, seeking to avoid competition with other New York property owners, has wisely arranged to bring tenants from European countries.

England and France through their governments will exhibit their finest products. Rockefeller city space and a bill signed by President Hoover makes that center, bounded by certain New York streets, a "free port."

Objects sent there for exhibition only can be admitted free of duty, no customs charge collected unless the goods are sold.

Rudy Vallee is studying law, against a time when "I shall sing no more." He will find that very profitable crooning is done in his new profession.

Smithsonian Institution Sends Expedition.

An expedition into the land of the Jivaro head-hunters of Ecuador, to investigate the strange rites and customs of these Indians, has begun a trek under the command of Mr. Matthew Stirling, of the Smithsonian institution.

It will take two months for the expedition to communicate with the world outside from the jungle in which these warlike tribes live. Few white men have ever penetrated parts of the route followed by the expedition to the Jivaro country, which lies around the great rivers Pastaza, Morona, Upano-Santiago, and their tributaries.

Mr. Stirling is particularly interested in the head-hunting customs, the religious rites and the mysterious drugs used by the Jivaros. The arrows used by the tribes are tipped with poison which kills animals instantly, and in the tribal wars it is the custom to sever the heads of the vanquished and keep them as trophies.

The head is treated with hot sand until it shrinks to the size of an orange but yet retains its human features. Then it is dyed black with charcoal. The most essential part of the trophy is the hair. Among the Jivaros the men wear their hair longer than the women. They believe that the hair is the seat of the soul.

One of the most powerful drugs known to the Jivaros is the drink known as Maikoa. It has the power of causing peculiar visions and hallucinations. The "souls of ancestors" appear in all sorts of terrible shapes as tigers, eagles, giant snakes or other wild animals. Only after a man has experienced these strange hallucinations does he consider himself a true warrior.

The Jivaros are so quarrelsome that the tribes do not congregate in villages, each family having its separate habitation. Witchcraft beliefs are universal among them. When a death occurs, it is most likely to be attributed to a spell cast by another family, and then one of the great blood feuds starts.

Although warlike, the Jivaros never make war for territorial conquest. They believe the land of their enemies harbors secret supernatural dangers which threaten even the victorious.

Study New Bullet

Military experts of Europe are much interested in a new bullet, invented by a German engineer, which is said to attain a velocity of 5,800 feet a second, more than twice that of any other bullet, and to penetrate hardened armor plate one-half inch thick.

Consistency is often another name for contrariness.

Man's loose actions often get him in a tight place.

Digging Into the Past

The annual Smithsonian exploration reports tell of science's march through jungles, deserts and mountains in an unceasing quest for more knowledge about human beings, bugs, birds and beasts. Important among the fossil-gathering expeditions was that under Dr. Charles W. Gilmore. In Montana and Wyoming it found 600 specimens of fossil animals. The prizes were the partial skeletons of a rhinoceros-like creature and six skulls of ancient crocodiles.

"He'll be in the Mescal tepee next to Big Elk's house. They built it there when he was chief, and they still use it regularly for the ceremony. Yancey showed it to me once, when he drove me out here." She stopped and cleared her throat, for her voice was suddenly husky. She wondered, confusedly, if that sound was the drum or her own heart beating. She gave a little cracked laugh that bordered on hysteria. "A drum in the night. It sounds so terrible. So savage."

Sol Levy now took the reins from her shaking fingers. "There is nothing to be frightened about. A lot of poor ignorant Indians trying to forget their misery. Come." Perhaps no man ever made a more courageous gesture, for the little sensitive Jew was terribly frightened.

Uncertainly, in the blackness, they made their way toward the drum beat. Nearer and nearer, louder and louder. And yet all about, darkness, silence. Only that pulsing cry and rattle and beat pounding through the night like the tide. What if he is not there? thought Sabra.

Sol Levy pulled up in the roadway before the trampled yard that held the Mescal tepee, round, to turn the sun, built of wood, larger than any other building on the reservation. The horses were frightened, restive. All about in the blackness you heard the stamp of other horses' hoofs, heard them crunching the dried herbage of the autumn prairie. With difficulty he groped his way to a stump that served as hitching post, and tied the horses. As he helped Sabra down her knees suddenly bent, and he caught her as she sank. "Oh! It's all right. Stiff, I guess—from the ride." She leaned against him a moment, then straightened determinedly. He took her arm firmly. Together they made their way toward the tent-shaped wooden tepee.

Two great, silent blanketed figures at the door through which the fitful flame of the sacred fire flared. The figures did not speak. They stood there, barring the way. The little Jew felt Sabra's arm trembling in his hand. He peered up into the face of the silent, immobile figures.

Suddenly, "Hello, Joe!" He turned to Sabra. "It's Joe Yellow Eyes. He was in the store only yesterday. Say, Joe, the lady here—Mrs. Cravat—she wants her son should come out and go home."

The blanketed figure stood silent.

Suddenly Sabra thought. "This is ridiculous."

She loosed her arm. She took a step forward, her profile sharp and clear in the firelight. "I am the woman of Yancey Cravat, the one you call Buffalo Head. If my son is in there I want to take him home now. It is time."

"Sure take um home," replied the Indian that Sol had addressed as Joe Yellow Eyes. He stood aside. Blinking, stumbling a little, Sol and Sabra entered the crowded Mescal tepee.

The ceremony was almost at an end. With daybreak it would be finished. Blinded by the light, Sabra at first could discern nothing except the central fire and the figure crouched before it. Yet her eyes went this way and that, searching for him. Gradually her vision cleared. The figures within the tepee paid no attention to those two white intruders. They stood there in the doorway, bewildered, terrified, brave.

In the center a crescent of earth about six inches high curved around a fire built of sticks so arranged that as the ashes fell they formed a second crescent within the other. A man squatted, tending this fire, watchfully, absorbedly. In the center of the crescent, upon a little star of sage twigs, lay the mescal, symbol of the rite. Facing them was the chief, old Stump Horn, in the place of honor, the emblems of office in his hands—the rattle, the wand, the fan of eagle plumes. All about the tepee crouched or lay blanketed motionless figures. Some sat with heads bowed, others gazed fixedly upon the central mescal button. All had been eating the mescal or drinking a brew in which it had steeped. Now and then a figure would slowly draw the blanket over his head and sink back to receive the vision. And the song went on, the shaking of the gourd rattle, the beat-beat of the buckskin drum. The air of the room was stifling, the room itself scrupulously clean.

At intervals around the wall, and almost level with the dirt floor, were apertures perhaps sixteen inches square. A little wooden door was shut upon most of these. Near each lay figures limper, more spent even than the other inert bodies. As Sabra and Sol stood, blinking, they learned the use of these openings. For suddenly nausea overcame one of the Indians crouched in the semicircle near the flame. The man crawled swiftly to one of the little doors, opened it, thrust his head and shoulders out into the night air, relieved his body of the drug's overdose.

Sabra only turned her eyes away, searching, searching. Then she saw where the boy lay under his gay striped blanket. His face was covered, but she knew. She knew well how the slim body curled in its blankets, how it lay at night, asleep. This was a different sleep, but she knew. They went to him, picking their way over the crouching figures with the fixed trancelike gaze; the recumbent forms that lay so still. She turned back the blanket. His face was smiling, peaceful, lovely.

She thought, "This is the way I should look at him if he were dead." Then, "He is dead." The boy lay breathing quietly. All about the room was an atmosphere of reverie, of swooning bliss. If the Indians looked at all at Sabra, at the Jew, at their efforts to rouse the boy, it was with the eyes of sleep-walkers. Their lips were gently smiling. Sometimes they swayed a little. The sacred fire leaped orange and scarlet and gold. Old Stump Horn wielded his eagle feather fan, back and forth, back and forth. The quavering cadences of the Mescal song rose and fell to the accompaniment of the gourd rattle and the unceasing drum. The white man and woman, frail both, tugged and strained at the inert figure of the boy.

"Oh, God!" whimpered Sabra. "He's so heavy. What shall we do?" They bent again, tugged with all their strength, lifted but could not carry him.

"We must drag him," Sol said, at last.

They took an arm each. So, dragging, tugging, past those rapt still forms, past those mazed smiling faces, they struggled with him to the door. The little beads of sweat stood out on her forehead, on her lip. She breathed in choking gasps. Her eyes were wide and staring and dreadful in their determination. The rattle. The drum beat. The high eerie song notes, wordless.

The blackness of the outer air; past the two towering motionless blanketed figures at the door. Dragging him along the earth, through the trampled weeds.

"We can't lift him into the buggy. We can't—" She ran back to the two at the door. She clasped her hands before the one called Joe Yellow Eyes. She lifted her white, agonized face to him. "Help me. Help me." She made a futile gesture of lifting.

The Indian looked at her a moment with a dead, unseeing gaze. Flecks of gold and yellow danced, reflected in the black pools of his eyes, and died there. Leisurely, wordless, he walked over to where the boy lay, picked him up lightly in his great arms as though he were a sack of meal, swung him into the buggy seat. He turned, then, and went back to his place at the door.

They drove back to the town of Osage. Cim's body leaned heavily, slackly against hers; his head lay in her lap, like a little boy's. One aching arm she held firmly about him to keep him from slipping to the floor of the buggy, so that finally it ceased to ache and became numb. The dawn came, and then the sunrise over the prairie, its red meeting the red of the Oklahoma earth, so that they drove through a fiery furnace.

She had been quiet enough until now, with a kind of stony quiet. She began to sob; a curious dry racking sound, like a hiccough.

"Now, now," said Sol Levy, and made a little comforting noise between tongue and teeth. "So bad it isn't. What did the boy do, he went out to see the sights on the reservation and try what it was like to eat this dope stuff—this peyote. Say, when I was a boy I did lots worse."

She did not seem to pay much heed to this, but it must have penetrated her numbed brain at last, for presently she stopped the painful sobbing and looked down at his lovely smiling face in her lap, the long lashes, like a girl's, resting so fragilely on the olive cheek.

"He wanted to go. I wouldn't let him. Is it too late, Sol?"

"Go? Go where?"

"The Colorado school of mines. Geology."

"Too late! That kid there! Don't talk foolish. September. This is the time to go. It just starts. Sure he'll go."

They drove through the yard, over Sabra's carefully tended grass, of which she was so proud, right to the edge of the porch steps, and so, dragging again and pulling, they got him in, undressed him; she washed his dust-smeared face.

"Well," said Sol Levy. "I guess I go and open the store and then have a good cup of coffee."

She put out her hand. Her lower lip was caught between her teeth, sharp and tight. Her face was distorted absurdly with her effort not to cry. But when he would have patted her grimed and trembling hand with his own, in a gesture of comforting, she caught his hand to her lips and kissed it.

The sound of the horses' hoofs died away on the still morning air. She looked down at Cim. She thought, I will take a bath, and then I will have some coffee, too. Yancey has gone again. Has left me. I know that. How do I know it? Well, nothing more can happen to me now. I have had it all, and I have borne it. Nothing more can happen to me now.

CHAPTER XII

For years Oklahoma had longed for statehood as a bride awaits the dawn of her wedding day. At last, "Behold the bridegroom!" said a paternal government, handing her over to the Union. "Here is a star for your forehead. Meet the family."

Then, at the very altar, the final words spoken, the pact sealed, the bride had turned to encounter a stranger—an unexpected guest, dazzling, breath-taking, embodying all her wildest girlish dreams.

"Bridegroom—h—l!" yelled Oklahoma, hurling herself into the stranger's arms. "What's family to me! Go away! Don't bother me. I'm busy."

The name of the gorgeous stranger was Oil.

Oil. Nothing else mattered. Oklahoma, the dry, the wind-swept, the burning, was a sea of hidden oil. The red prairies, pricked, ran black and slimy with it. The work of years was undone in a day. The sunbonnets shrank back, aghast. Compared to that which now took place the early days following the Run in '89 were idyllic. They swarmed on Oklahoma from every state in the Union. The plains became black with little eager delving figures. The sanguine roads were choked with every sort of vehicle. Once more tent and shanty towns sprang up where the day before had been only open prairie staring up at a blazing sky. Again the gambling tent, the six-shooter, the roaring saloon, the dance hall, the harlot. Men fought, stole, killed, died for a piece of ground beneath whose arid surface lay who knew what wealth of fluid richness. Every barren sun-baked farm was a potential fortune; every ditch and draw and dried-up creek bed might conceal liquid treasure. The Wildcat field—Panhandle—Cimarron—Crook Nose—Cartwright—Wahoo—Bear Creek—these became magic names; these were the Seven Cities of Cibola, rich beyond Coronado's wildest dream. Millions of barrels of oil burst through the sand and shale and clay and drenched the parched earth. Drill, pump, blast. Nitroglycerin. Here she comes. A roar. Oklahoma went stark raving mad.

Sabra Cravat went oil mad with the rest of them. Just outside the town of Osage, for miles around, they were drilling. There was that piece of farm land she had bought years ago, when Yancey first showed signs of restlessness. She had thought herself shrewd to have picked up this fertile little oasis in the midst of the bare unlovely plain. She was proud of her bit of farm land with its plump yield of alfalfa, corn, potatoes, and garden truck. She knew now why it had been so prolific. By a whim of nature rich black oil lay under all that surrounding land, rendering it barren through its hidden riches. No taint of corroding oil ran beneath that tract of Cravat farm land, and because of this it lay there now, so green, so lush, with its beans, its squash, its ridiculous onions, taunting her, deriding her, like a mirage in the desert. Queerly enough, she had no better luck with her share in an oil lease for which she had paid a substantial sum—much more than she could afford to lose. Machinery, crew, days of drilling, weeks of drilling, sand, shale, salt. The well had come up dry—a duster.

That which happened to Sabra happened to thousands. The stuff was elusive, tantilizing. Here might be a gusher vomiting millions. Fifty feet away not so much as a spot of grease could be forced to the surface. Fortune seemed to take a delight in choosing strange victims for her pranks. Erv Wissler, the gawk who delivered the milk to Sabra's door each morning, found himself owner of a gusher whose outpourings yielded him seven thousand dollars a day. He could not grasp it.

"Why, Erv!" Sabra exclaimed, when he arrived at her kitchen door as usual, smelling of the barnyard. "Seven thousand dollars a day! What in the world are you going to do with it!"

Erv's putty features and all his loose-hung frame seemed to stiffen with the effort of his new and momentous resolve. "Well, I tell you, Mis' Cravat, I made up my mind I ain't going to make no more Sunday delivery myself. I'm a-going to hire Pete Lynch's boy to take the milk route Sundays."

Every one in Osage knew the story of Fred Sloat's wife when the news was brought to her that weeks of drilling on the sterile little Sloat farm had brought up a gusher. They had come running to her across the trampled fields with the news. She had stood there on the back porch of the shabby farmhouse, a bony drudge, unlovely as the house itself.

"Millions!" they shouted at her. "Millions and millions! What are you going to do?"

Fred Sloat's wife had looked down at her hands, shriveled and gnarled from alkali water and rough work. She wiped them now on a corner of her gingham apron with a gesture of utter finality. Her meager shoulders straightened. The querulous voice took on a note of defiance.

"From now on I'm goin' to have the washin' done out."

In those first few frenzied weeks there was no time for scientific methods. That came later. Now, in the rush of it, they all but burrowed in the red clay with their finger nails. Men prowled the plains with divining rods, with absurd things called witch sticks, hoping thus to detect the precious stuff beneath the earth's surface.

For years the meandering red clay roads that were little more than trails had seen only occasional buggies, farm wagons, horsemen, an Indian family creeping along in a miserable cart or—rarely—an automobile making perilous progress through the thick dust in the dry season or the slippery dough in the wet. Now those same roads were choked, impassable. The frail wooden one-way bridges over creeks and draws sagged and splintered with the stream of traffic, but no one took the time to repair them. A torrent of vehicles of every description flowed without ceasing, night and day. Frequently the torrent choked itself with its own volume, and then the thousands were piled there, locked, cursing, writhing, battling, on their way to the oil fields. From the Crook Nose field to Wahoo was a scant four miles; it sometimes took half a day to cover it in a motor car. Trucks, drays, wagons, rigs, flivvers, buckboards. Every day was like the day of the Opening back in '89. Millionaire promoters from the East, engineers, prospectors, drillers, tool dressers, shooters, pumpers, roustabouts, Indians. Men in London-tailored suits and shirts from Charvet's. Only the ruthless and desperate survived. In the days of the covered wagon scarcely twenty years earlier those roads had been trails over the hot, dry plains marked by the bleaching skull of a steer or the carcass of a horse, picked clean by the desert scavengers and turned white and desolate to the blazing sky. A wagon wheel, a rusted rim, a split wagon tongue lay at the side of the trail, mute evidence of a traveler laboriously crawling his way across the prairie. Now the ditches by the side of these same roads were strewn with the bodies of wrecked and abandoned automobiles, their skeletons stripped and rotting, their lamps staring up at the sky like sightless eyes, testimony to the passing of the modern ravisher of that tortured region. Up and down the dust-choked roads, fenders ripped off like flies' wings, wheels interlocking, trucks overturned, loads sunk in the mud, plank bridges splitting beneath the strain. Devil take the hindmost. It was like an army push, but without an army's morale or discipline. Bear Creek boasted a killing a day and not a jail nor a courthouse for miles around. Men and women, manacled to a common chain, were marched like slave convicts down the road to the nearest temple of justice, a rough pine shack in a town that had sprung overnight on the prairie. There were no railroads where there had been no towns.

Boilers loaded on two wagons were hauled by twenty-mule-team outfits. Stuck in the mud as they inevitably were, only mules could have pulled the load out. Long lines of them choked the already impassable road. Wagons were heaped with the pipes through which the oil must be led; with lumber, hardware, rigs, tools, portable houses—all the vast paraphernalia of sudden wealth and growth in a frontier community.

Tough careless young boys drove the nitro-glycerin cars, a deadly job on those rough and crowded roads. It was this precious and dreadful stuff that shot the oil up out of the earth. Hard lads in corduroys took their chances and pocketed their high pay, driving the death-dealing wagons, singing as they drove, a red shirt tail tied to a pole flaunting its warning at the back of the load. Often an expected wagon would fail to appear. The workers on the field never took the trouble to trace it or the time to wait for it. They knew that somewhere along the road was a great gaping hole, with never a sizable fragment of wood or steel or bone or flesh anywhere for yards around to tell the tale they already knew.

Acres that had been carefully tended so that they might yield their scanty crop of cabbages, onions, potatoes were abandoned to oil, the garden truck rotting in the ground. Rawboned farmers and their scrawny wives and pindling brats, grown spectacularly rich overnight, walked out of their houses without taking the trouble to move the furniture or lock the door. It was not worth while. They left the sleazy curtains on the windows, the pots on the stove. The oil crew, clanking in, did not bother to wreck the house unless they found it necessary. In the midst of an inferno of oil rigs, drills, smoke, steam, and seeping oil itself the passer-by would often see a weather-beaten farmhouse, its windows broken, its front askew, like a beldame gone mad, gray hair streaming about her crazed face as she stared out at the pandemonium of oil hell about her.

The farmers moved into Osage, or Oklahoma City, or Wahoo. They bought automobiles and silk shirts and gew-gaws, like children. The men sat on the front porch in shirt sleeves and stocking feet and spat tobacco juice into the fresh young grass.

Mile on mile, as far as the eye could see, were the skeleton frames of oil rigs outlined against the sky like giant Martian figures stalking across the landscape. Horrible new towns—Bret Harte wooden-front towns—sprang up overnight on the heels of an oil strike; towns inhabited by people who never meant to stay in them; stark and hideous houses thrown up by dwellers who never intended to remain in them; rude frontier crossroad stores stuffed with the necessities of frontier life and the luxuries of sudden wealth all jumbled together in a sort of mercantile miscegenation. The thump and clank of the pump and drill; curses, shouts; the clatter of thick dishes, the clink of glasses, the shrill laughter of women; fly-infested shanties. Oil, smearing itself over the prairies like a plague, killing the grass, blighting the trees, spreading over the surface of the creeks and rivers. Signs tacked to tree stumps or posts; For Ambulance Call 487. Sim Neeley, Undertaker. Call 549. Call Doctor Keogh 735.

Oklahoma—the Red People's country—lay heaving under the hot summer sun, a scarred and dreadful thing with the oil drooling down its face a viscid stream.

Tracy Wyatt, who used to drive the bus and dray line between Wahoo and Osage, standing up to the reins like a good-natured red-faced charioteer as the wagon bumped over the rough roads, was one of the richest men in Oklahoma—in the whole of the United States, for that matter. Wyatt. The Wyatt Oil company. In another five years the Wyatt Oil companies. You were to see their signs all over the world. The "Big Boys" from the East were to come to him, hat in hand, to ask his advice about this; to seek his favor for that. The sum of his daily income was fantastic. The mind simply did not grasp it. Tracy himself was, by now, a portly and not undignified looking man of a little more than fifty. His good-natured, rubicund face wore the grave slightly astonished look of a commonplace man who suddenly finds himself a personage.

Mills Once Centers of Community Social Life

"Ozark milling days" are recalled in an article in the Arcadian Magazine:

"Two or three generations ago, the mill was a vigorous community center, the popular meeting place for all classes and conditions of men. It was no uncommon thing to ride 50 miles to mill and camp two or three days while waiting a turn. The burrs ground slowly and quite often the output did not exceed two or three bushels an hour. This gave opportunity for amusement and social contacts. It was a great place to play marbles, pitch horseshoes, to play rustic pranks, swap news, stories and jacknives. Sometimes there were fights, for hill blood is fighting blood, but, for the most part, the men fought fair.

"At midnight on Saturday night the watergate was closed and not opened until the following Monday morning. The closed gate formed an excellent fish trap and often the catch was good. It was the custom at one mill to auction off the fish that might be caught over the Sabbath to the highest bidder. The auction was held on Saturday afternoon before the gate was closed and if no fish happened to get in, the successful bidder paid just the same.

"Sometimes the mill floor was used for the dance when the day's work was done. Or if no fiddlers were present, the young folks stepped to the tune of 'Buffalo Girls' or 'Old Dan Tucker,' singing as they danced. Many an old mill was the scene of this beautiful custom that has today lost out in competition with the modern dance."—Detroit News.

Properly Southern States

The original Mason-Dixon line was the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Maryland; just before the Civil war the line was accepted as the dividing line between free and slave states. The states generally regarded as southern are Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware. The Mississippi river, which forms the eastern boundary of Missouri, does not change its name. The Missouri river divides the state, but the whole of Missouri is considered as a southern or border state.

Cash Revenue in Woods on Farms

Can Be Made to Yield Returns Well Worth While.

By E. G. WIESEHUEGEL, Forester, Ohio State University.—WNU Service.

Managing the farm woods so that it can be used as a source for repair materials on the farm and a permanent crop that will produce a direct cash revenue is sound farm practice.

Although most farmers like to work with pine and other soft-wood lumber, it is possible to save considerable expense by using those species grown in the state. Good pine for construction purposes will cost from $65 to over $100 per thousand, while local green oak may be obtained at $25 and chestnut at $32 per thousand. Still more can be saved by having this material cut from the farmer's own woodlot, the difference going into his pocket for labor in getting the material out.

Dead and diseased, decayed and dying trees can be removed and used for fuel, or if sound sawed into lumber. Open places may be filled in with seedlings of ash, walnut, poplar and other species that can be used on the farm. In this way the woods may be made a place of pride and of value instead of the most neglected part of the farm.

The farm woods provide a shelter belt and protect crops and live stock from the wind, produce maple sugar, provide refuge for game and nesting birds which destroy crop insects, and act as a reserve of cash in time of need. Although this is a poor year to sell timber, many farmers are turning to the woods in order to obtain funds to pay taxes and the interest on loans.

Cultivate, and Destroy Weeds That Hurt Crops

The main purpose of corn cultivation is to kill weeds, and if it can be done without aerating the soil too much or disturbing the roots of the young corn plants, the more successful the crop will be, state Iowa State college investigators, reported by the Prairie Farmer. Contrary to general belief, they find, cultivation does not keep water in the soil. It does kill weeds that would use moisture, however.

The roots of the corn plant are located in the first six or seven inches of soil. It is in this layer of soil that the most nutrients are found. Summer rains of one-quarter to an inch moisten only about three inches of soil. Stirring of this layer aerates and dries out the soil and prevents the roots from securing food and moisture.

The theory that water moves upward through the soil capillary system from great depths beneath the surface has been disproved. Unless there are great amounts of moisture in the soil there is little or no such action.

Weed destruction through shallow cultivation is likely to be the most profitable.

Protect Farm Machinery

With lower prices making it necessary for farmers to economize, they are turning to the care of machinery as one way to reduce expenses. Surveys have shown that housed machinery lasts just about twice as long as that which is exposed to the weather, says the United States Department of Agriculture.

Many farmers unable to put all their implements under cover are taking the next best method of protecting them from rust and other weather damage. This is by oiling metal parts. Implements such as plows, cultivators, and disks must have their working surfaces shiny to do good work and greasing them prevents rust. Intricate parts of machines, such as the knotter on a binder, may be kept from rusting by spraying or swabbing with oil. Machine oil or used crankcase oil is good for this.

Careful cleaning will help preserve some implements, even if they are left out in the weather. Grain and dust often collect in corners in drills, grain boxes, and combines. Cleaning these out helps prevent their rotting.

How He Got Clover

Rock phosphate pays better dividends than limestone on Marion Finley's farm in Vermilion county, Illinois.

"I had the soil in one field tested," said Mr. Finley, "and found that it needed one to four tons of lime an acre. I treated it with one ton of rock phosphate an acre and got a dandy stand of mixed clover. Every ton of rock phosphate contains 600 pounds of lime. The phosphate makes corn mature earlier, gives a better quality, and I believe it pays better to buy the rock phosphate than to spend the same money for lime." — Capper's Farmer.

Corn Following Sudan

Contrary to general belief sudan grass does not reduce the yield of the corn crop which follows any more than some other crops. Tests at Iowa State college over a ten-year period show that where corn and sudan were grown in a two-year rotation, compared with corn and oats and corn and soybeans, each in two-year rotations under similar conditions, the yields of corn with the sudan have been fully as good as those with the soybeans or oats.—Prairie Farmer.

The DAIRY

BEST CROPS GROWN ON FERTILE SOIL

Dairy Farmer in Position to Enrich Fields.

By JOHN A. AREY, Dairy Extension Specialist, North Carolina State College. WNU Service.

Dairy farming improves soils instead of depleting them. On every well-handled dairy farm large quantities of legume hays, wheat bran, cottonseed meal and other such feeds are converted into milk through cows, yet there is a considerable residue left in the form of manure which will help to build up the soil.

Careful calculation of the plant food value of these feeds on a basis of ten cents a pound for nitrogen and five cents a pound each for phosphoric acid and potash, shows that alfalfa hay has a plant food value of $6 a ton; soybean hay, $7.85; clover hay, $6.69; wheat bran, $9.69; corn meal, $4.69 and cottonseed meal, $15.92. Only about 20 per cent of this plant food value is lost in the feeding process, which means that there is a gradual accumulation of plant food on every well-managed dairy farm. Further evidence is shown by the good crops usually produced on such a farm.

Not only does dairy farming help to build up the soil, but the cropping system followed prevents much washing.

On account of the organic matter and countless bacteria in cow manure, it has a greater farm value than a chemical analysis would show. The organic matter improved the physical condition of the land and increases its water-holding capacity. This improved condition also makes a favorable situation for the bacteria to liberate plant food in the soil particles.

I do not believe any system of farming can be permanently profitable unless soil fertility is maintained. It makes no difference what the cash return may be from a crop, because if the wealth is secured at the expense of the soil, the farmer will lose in the end.

Shelter for Dairy Cow of Utmost Importance

The dairy cow, because of the fact that she puts the products from her feed into the milk pail instead of in the form of flesh and fat on her body, needs better shelter than the fattening stock. It is not necessary for this shelter to be expensive, but it should be adequate to the needs of the climate, and should insure the cow being warm and dry, and having plenty of light, and pure air. The best winter temperature for dairy barns is between 50 and 60 degrees. If the temperature goes much above or below this there will be a decrease in the yield of milk.

There is perhaps no consideration that needs greater attention, especially in the Northwest, than provision of proper ventilation, particularly of dairy barns. There are very few barns that come up to the standard specifications as to light and ventilation. The dairy barn, in order to produce the best results, should provide a cubic foot of air space for each pound of weight of the cows confined to the barn, and good ventilation should insure this air being kept pure without forming drafts. It is as injurious to a cow to breathe impure air, as it is for human beings.—Dakota Farmer.

Old Separators

An Ohio dairyman writes that he can see no object in getting up so early to milk and deliver milk to the station; that he is going to "get out the old separator" and try selling cream for a while. "I may not make any more selling cream, but I'll not have to get up quite so early," he declares.

Quite a few whole-milk dairymen are "getting out the old separator." There's a disturbing thought. Not that they shouldn't separate the milk and sell cream, for that's a splendid thing to do. The disturbing thought is that some of these separators may go into service badly in need of repairs and adjustments.

A separator out of adjustment can cause a tremendous loss. A faulty separator leaves fat in the skim milk. The loss should not get above two-hundredths of one per cent. The cow tester in Finney Association, Kan., says two of twelve separators tested were losing over five-hundredths of one per cent. H. R. Searles reports a loss of 16-hundredths of one per cent—a loss amounting to 16 pounds of fat in every 10,000 pounds of milk.—Farm Journal.

Good and Poor Cows

The conclusion that one good cow is worth ten poor ones was reached by J. W. Ingels after studying records of the farmers' association of which he is the tester.

He found that the average cow in the Lee-Des Moines Cow Testing association paid her owner $35.96 above feed cost last year.

On the other hand the 14 low-producers returned an average of $3.62 profit, or slightly more than one-tenth of the mean production.

BABY "WENT TO ALMOST NOTHING"

Then Eagle Brand saved the day!

"WE ARE sending you a picture of our daughter, Alice Ann," writes Mrs. Joel Buttgereit, 132 Arch St., Verona, Penn., "to show you what Eagle Brand has done for our baby when three other baby foods failed.

"Our baby weighed 9 pounds at birth and went to almost nothing. Then we tried Eagle Brand, and with her first feeding, she seemed satisfied. She started to pick up right away and at eight months weighed 26 pounds and had 8 teeth.

"Writing could never express our gratitude for what Eagle Brand has done for our baby."

PERRY FARMER ENTHUSIASTIC OVER AUSTRIAN PEAS

Doubles Cotton Yield In 1931 On Five Hundred Acres Land

Dr. R. C. Hanna, owner of a large farm near Marion, has found that it is unwise for farmers to buy nitrogen in commercial form when Austrian peas, if given an opportunity, will take from the air all that is needed. He has found that gathering nitrogen this way is much cheaper and better than buying it in commercial form and, in addition, Austrian peas add a lot of humus to the soil, which is another important need.

Dr. Hanna began a few years ago with Austrian peas. His farm was washed and much of the plant food in the soil had disappeared. It had been operated by tenants with little thought given to care of the soil itself. Cotton was the main crop and the yields were very low.

In 1931 the cotton yield was doubled on 500 acres; and, for the first time in many years, the farm made all the feed that was needed.

At the end of the year Dr. Hanna made a comparison of two tenants, one of whom used Austrian peas and the other did not. The one who didn't use peas made 7 bales of cotton and four loads of corn with two plows. The other, who used Austrian peas and cultivated the same amount of land, made 16 bales of cotton and 10 loads of corn. Seeing the advantages of Austrian peas Dr. Hanna planted 28,000 pounds in the fall of 1931. Both cotton and corn following the Austrian peas are now very promising, unless boll weevils destroy a lot of the cotton.

Similar results have been obtained by many other Marion County farmers, according to J. P. Robinson, county agent. They have used it for enriching land for producing corn, cotton, and other crops, and also as an early spring pasture crop as well as a hay crop in combination with oats.

MR. AND MRS BELL ANNOUNCE MARRIAGE OF THEIR DAUGHTER

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Bell, of Vincent announced the engagement of their daughter, Ila Florine, to John Alexander Miller, at a lovely bridge party on Monday night at their home in Vincent, Alabama. Looking Things Over

By George and Tip

The following editorial, appearing in Collier's Magazine for July 9, has become of such national importance, being favorably commented on by editors and important personages thruout the nation, that it is credited with being one of the best editorials in recent months by any periodical. It is of real, constructive help to people as it gives a better perspective of conditions as they really are in these days of exaggerated pessimism. It is as follows:

COUNT YOUR CHANGE

"There's no argument in this editorial. It's merely a collection of facts, incontrovertible, eloquent facts that confound those who profess to see America slipping down into a state of effortless despair . . .

"Total bank savings today exceed $29,000,000,000, equal to more than $1,000 for every family in the land. Savings depositors number 52,000,000, nearly two per family.

"The number of Americans owning stock has increased almost 40 per cent since 1929.

"A group of 102 companies which had 5,539,036 stockholders at the end of the boom year had 7,675,143 stockholders at the beginning of this year.

"One company alone today has over 665,000 stockholders, a gain of more than 195,000 since the boom. This company has assets exceeding $3,200,000,000 . . .

"Our total stock of gold is $4,000,000. No other country ever possessed so much. Britain, for example, has only $558,000,000. Currency in circulation aggregates $5,464,000,000 or $700,000,000 more than in the boom.

"Last year $16,500,000 worth of new life insurance was written.

"Total insurance now carried is estimated at $109,000,000,000, or not far short of $1,000 for every man, woman and child in the United States. Policies in force total 127,800,000 . .

"Such safeguard . . . is enjoyed by the people of no other nation in the world.

"Our total national wealth, estimated at $329,700,000,000 is greater than that of a dozen Continental European countries combined.

"The income of the American people comfortably exceeds $1,000,000,000 a week.

"The per capita income here is far greater than in any other land.

"There are still sir or seven persons gainfully employer for every person idle.

"No fewer than 25,800,000 automobiles are owned by Americans . . . This total is almost three times the number owned by all the rest of the world.

"Americans possess far more telephones (19,500,000) than all other countries . . . Radios . . . multiply . .. over 16,545,000 . . . unapproached by any other people.

"How many new domestic mechanical refrigerators have been bought, would you guess? A grand total of fully 3,750,000, at an estimated expenditure approaching 2,000,000,000 . . In no other part of the globe do half as many homes enjoy such a luxury—Americans are rapidly coming to regard it as anecessity.

A recent survey of 29 typical small towns revealed that 70 per cent of the inhabitants owned homes, that 88 per cent had electric lights, 72 per cent had baths, 51 per cent had electrie washers, 55 per cent had radios, 41 per cent had vacuum cleaners.

"There are more families in America than in any other land that can afford to and do send their children to high school and college. In no other land do so many average families have the means to enjoy foreign travel . . .

" . . . The movie still attracts a weekly average attendance of 75,000,000 . . .

"The percentage of our agricultural population who, despite deflation, are acquiring domestic comforts, conveniences, labor-saving devices, improved machinery, the use of better roads, is constantly increasing.

"Today more than 700,000 farms are electrified, representing an increase of 400 per cent in eight years, and the total is being sweled rapidly.

"In industrial communities hard manual toil is being steadily abolished by the introduction of machinery. Each American worker now has at his command five horsepower a record not even remotely approached outside our boundaries.

"The average working-day a generation ago was ten to twelve hours. The standard in this generation is eight hours . . . The work-week used to consist of six days. Now it is five and one-half days, with the five-day week coming into vogue.

"Never in the past was America so well equipped as it is today to resume an epochal forward march. Not only have we changed from a debtor nation to the greatest creditor nation on earth, not only have we vaster national wealth, not only have we an unprecedented supply of gold, but we are richer in experience, richer in productive facilities, richer in managerial skill, richer in discovered mineral and oil resources, richer in transportation facilities; . . . richer in every material wealth-creating product and process, richer in craftsmanship, richer in everything.

"The country is alright. What we need is less hysteria and more confidence and courage."

A detailed discussion of each of these important factors bearing directly on Shelby County was heard.

Realizing that a change in population of any school unit, state, county or city affects the educational program of that unit, population trends in Shelby County were next taken up. However, comparison of school census and enrollment for the past two decades showed small average increase in percentage of population—only about 7.47.

The third item presented was an important and an interesting one—School Transportation and Development in Shelby County.

Transportation is now definitely accepted in Alabama as a proper responsibility in connection with public rural education. Many serious problems are involved in the transportation of these children to the consolidated schools. Only a few years ago there was no school transportation in Shelby County. Now, the number of children transported in Shelby County has increased fully as rapidly as in the average county of the state. In fact, the cost of transportation in this County for white children alone has increased from $2,512.50 in 1916-27 to $28,947.77 in 1930-31 and the number of children served in this same time has in creased from 452 to 1997.

A most interesting bit of history attracted the writer's attention in that the transportation of children to school in Shelby County began 10 or 12 years ago when Buck Creek Cotton Mills Company put on a covered wagon at their own expense. In this connection it is noted that this original wagon bed is still in service, carrying 37 children to and from the Thompson High School, the only remaining horse drawn vehicle now used in the County. There are now 35 automobile busses in daily use for the transportation of white children. Shelby County has developed an extensive transportation system in an earnest effort to make a good school available to every child of school age.

A complete road map is now on file is Superintendent J. W. Letson's office showing exact conditions of each route. Only careful drivers are employed, assuring the safety of the children in transit.

The present school buildings and sites in Shelby County were discussed. Some changes were recommended and 14 one and two-teacher school buildings were recommended for immediate abandonment owing to unsatisfactory conditions and equipment. Thirteen were recommended for temporary retention, and eighteen were recommended for permanent retention.

The teaching staff of the County were commended for their fine professional spirit. Out of a faculty of 158 teachers, 153 are affiliated with the Alabama Educational Association which has for the past half-century been working for the improvement of Education in Alabama.

The Survey Staff commended highly the Shelby County Board of Education for their adoption of these constructive policies as outlined, and suggested only that they continue the development of these policies furthering the educational cause. They expressed their appreciation for the courteous cooperation that had been received from each member of the Board and to Superintendent J. W. Letson whom they stated had been "unfailing in his helpful assistance throughout the entire enterprise."

SALE OF GAS SUSPENDED

The Alabama Department of Agriculture has 63,000 gallons of gasoline suspended from sale and has several inspectors busy taking samples to ascertain that gasoline and kerosene sold in the State comes up to the State standard. The suspended gasoline belongs to sixteen different dealers located in various parts of the State.

When gasoline or kerosene is found below standard it is suspended from sale and is not allowed to be sold until it meets the state standard.

FARM POPULATION INCREASES

The increase in farm population in 1931 was the largest and most significant in the 10 years in which the United States Department of Agriculture has been estimating changes in population.

For several years of this period annual decreases were reported and only during 1930 and 1931 were appreciable gains indicated. On January 1, 1932, the farm population was 31,260,000 on January 1, 1931, a gain of 648,000, according to department estimates.

THIS WEEK IN POLITICS

By E. BASKIN WRIGHT

STOCKS AND REPUBLICAN HOPES SOAR

The steady rise of stocks on the New York Exchange for the last week has brought much joy to Republican politicians and nominees. Nothing could do more for the Hoover-Curtis ticket than a trend toward prosperity, and no one recognizes this better than Mr. Hoover.

The American voter is a fickle person at best and in times of prosperity he is inclined to credit the party in power for the prosperity and blame the party in power for any business depression. There is no logic back of this point of view but every politician knows that the tendency is there.

The proof of the above statement, if proof is needed, may be found in a very cursory glance at American political history. During the eight years of Andrew Jackson's administrations (1829-1837) America saw an unprecedented era of prosperity.

In 1837 with Martin Van Buren in the White House there came the famous Panic of 1837 and as a result Van Buren and his Democratic Party were made the goats at the election of 1840 when the Whigs elected the incompetent William Henry Harrison and the uncertain John Tyler. The Whigs had no platform. They needed none. Only the panic was necessary to defeat Van Buren and it was a panic caused by speculation, over-expansion, and wildcat banking which Van Buren had nothing to do with.

In 1892 Grover Cleveland was elected to a second term after a lapse of four years mainly because the high McKinley tariff under President Benjamin Harrison had not produced the happy results predicted by the Republicans in the campaign of 1888. Cleveland had hardly taken office before the country found itself in the midst of the Panic of 1893, the worst "depression" since '37.

Cleveland, by heroic efforts and admirable administration stopped the panic but even his own party refused to endorse his administration at the Chicago Convention which nominated William Jennings Bryan, so great was the panic complex among the voters.

The Republican administrations of Harding and Coolidge enjoyed a prosperity never before equaled in America and the Democrats might just as well have been barking up a tree in trying to call the voters' attention to the Teapot Dome scandals of the Harding administration. The country was prosperous and what could it matter if public officials had stolen a few millions of the taxpayers' money for there was plenty left. All the Republicans had to do was to remind the voters of '37 and '93 and warn them to "Keep Cool With Coolidge."

Today the Republican Party finds itself in the embarrassing position of trying to dodge responsibility for the present "depression." After sitting in majestic inactivity for three years and more, President Hoover was suddenly galvanized into action by the approaching election and became remarkably solicitous regarding the welfare of the "Forgotten Man."

With the cooperation of the Democratic majority in the House a number of bills of a very constructive nature were passed and now the recent rise on the Stock Exchange is beginning to reflect the restoration of public confidence.

The rise may mean nothing or it may mean a great deal. It may even determine who shall occupy the White House after March 4, 1933. If the prices of stocks can be bolstered up until after the November election the Republican party should benefit greatly.

It is to be hoped that the healthy outlook of the market is a true index of the condition of the country. Americans are sick of hard times. They have learned to loathe the word "depression" and there is great hope that these increases in stock values represent the turning point.

Even a return of real prosperity might not save the Republican Party in November but it would certainly give the party a talking point which it does not, at present, have. It would then be possible to point with pride to Mr. Hoover as the savior of the country, the great business man who turned depression into prosperity.

There would be careful avoidance of any mention of the part played by the Democratic House in passing these non-partisan measures, now claimed by Hoover as the children of his own brain. There might be no sense to the claim but it would have its effect on numbers of voters; possibly not enough to swing the election but certainly it would make the task of Republican spellbinders much easier.

At present the Elephant looks expectantly toward New York and hopes that the economic gods will be kind .

ALABAMA GROWING FLORIDA MINDED IN TUNG OIL TREES

Fifteen Million Spent Abroad Annually For Varnish Product

That Alabama is getting Florida minded is indicted in the interest being manifested in the planting of Tung oil trees along the Gulf coast section. Florida has been rapidly pushing the planting of these trees for several years, and is now establishing plants for the manufacture of oil for varnish purposes.

It is estimated that $15,000,000 is annually sent to China for this product, and it is now proposed to grow and secure this needed oil at home. The experiments in Florida have proved a success and it is thought that both Alabama and Georgia can grow the trees also. In the three states above mentioned there are now more than 25,000 acres planted to Tung Oil trees, and the work is still being pushed. As these trees do not require fertile soil many thousands of acres of cheap lands can be used for their growth.

$5,000,000 HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION WORK WILL AID UNEMPLOYED

Contracts To Be Awarded Sept. 6; Work On Projects To Begin By First Of October

A five million dollar road building enterprise to relieve unemployment in Alabama has just been inaugurated by the advertising of contracts amounting to $1,750,000 by the state highway department. The bids on a dozen projects will be opened on September 6 and work will commence within thirty days after that date. Labor for these jobs will be chosen given the contractors by relief organizations with preference being given to ex-service men and men with dependents who are residents of Alabama.

The remaining highway projects will be determined as soon as possible, according to a statement made public by Capt. L. G. Smith, state highway director.

"We hope to have the whole thing cleared up within the next two weeks," said Capt. Smith. "It is a process which must be handled thru the federal government. We are working at it steadily and shall expedite the program will all possible speed."

Governor Miller also issued a statement urging persons without work to get in touch with recognized relief agencies immediately so that there may be no delay when the actual construction program gets under way..

"The keynote of this emergency road building program is to relieve unemployment," Governor Miller said, "and to connect the major trunk line highways of the state."

The road building plan is an emergency issue. It is the first highway construction which the state has undertaken in more than two years and has only been made possible by the appropriation of two and one half million dollars by the Federal government. This program is separate and not connected in any way with any further projects which may be undertaken by funds secured from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Capt. Smith has doubled the drafting force in his department during the past month and has plans nearly completed for submission to the federal Road Bureau for approval.

STATE LEGISLATURE FACES HUGE TASK IN EXTRAORDINARY MEET

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT

Shelby County's outstanding indebtedness in January, 1927, when the Merrell Board took charge, compared with the debt shown in the latest report, that of June 30, 1932:

January 1927:
Bond Issue of 1923, payable 1953	$375,000.02
Newell warrants issued in 1913	43,000.00
Columbiana Savings Bk...	23,476.55
Marshall & Bruce Co.	611.64
Roberts & Son	1,735.88
Tri-State Culvert Co.	9,673.40
Galion Iron Works	1,060.40
Marx & Company	4,313.00
John B. Weakley	7,693.87
Stranahan, Harris & Otis (Refunding Loan)	70,000.00
Stranahan, Harris & Otis (Interest)	13,200.00
State Security Bank	18,500.00
William Cooper & Nephews	1,560.28
Miscellaneous rd. war.	2,591.85
Total	$572,419.87

Our last report, issued June 30, 1932, shows outstanding indebtedness to be $441,000.00—a decrease since the Merrell Board of Revenue assumed office amounting to $131,419.87.

Among the debts paid by this Board were the Stranahan, Harris & Otis $70,000..00 and interest; Marx & Company; John B. Weakley, State Security Bank of Zanesville, Ohio, and the old Newell obligations paid as the warrants fell due, there being only $11,000.00 of this remaining.

There has also been placed in a sinking fund to retire the $375,000.00 bond issue, approximately $65,000.00, a portion of which has been used in the purchase of the bonds which the sinking fund was created to retire, and which we were enabled to buy at a considerable discount.

ALABAMA MAKING FINE PROGRESS ALONG WELFARE LINES

Brooking's Report Recommends Merging Welfare Institutions

Alabama is making fine progress in welfare work and few states in the union have done better in this regard, according to the Brooking's Institute which divides welfare work into four activities, the State hospital system, the Child Welfare Department, the State prison system and unrelated State agencies.

"Through the divisions named", says the report, "The state attempts to provide such service, care treatment and custody as may be necessary for the well-being of its wards, for the protection of society and for prevention of dependency and delinquency.

MISS MARY HARDEGREE HONORED WITH PARTY

'Round The World Journey" Featured At Lovely Affair Given Visitor Thursday Night

Misses Ruth Luck, Charlie Verne Tinney, Eleanor Atchison, and Doris Barbour were joint hostesses to one of the most unique parties of the seasen on Thursday night when a "Round The World Journey" was given in honor of Miss Mary Fances Hardegree of Ashland, the popular house guest of Miss Ruth Luck.

The first point of interest en route was "Fairyland", staged in the lovely home of Mr. and Mrs. Charlie Tinney, with Miss Charlie Verne Tinney hostess. The guests were taken once again to the land of childhood fancies and allowed to indulge their childish dreams in games incident to this carefree age. Blocks-electric trains and games were offered for their amusement after which blow gum and lollipops were served.

The guests next moved to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ed Atchison—where Miss Eleanor Atchison and Miss Doris Barbour greeted the wanderers. A typical French cabaret with tables and chairs on the spacious lawn proved most intriguing. Presenting each guest with a French beret, they were

Miller Presents Twenty-Four Subjects For Consideration After Issuing Formal Call

NECESSARY EDUCATIONAL FUNDS MUST BE AVAILABLE

Legislators Favor A State Sales Tax In Preference To State Income Tax Proposal

Faced with the difficult task of providing for the payment of the state indebtedness of $20,000,000 and of balancing the budget, the Alabama legislature has been called to convene in Extraordinary Session in Montgomery, August 16, by Governor Miller.

In his proclamation the governor suggests that the necessary funds be raised by drastic reductions in employees and their salaries, and that new sources of revenue be developed by revised tax laws.

An appeal for the enactment of a constitutional amendment, to be passed on by the voters and which shall provide for a state income tax, has been made by Governor Miller. The list of acts to be considered also contained suggestions for a bond issue to defray the present indebtedness, a re-allotment of the present five cent gasoline tax, and legislation to provide for convict camps throughout the state and to provide that state convicts may be worked on the highways.

The income tax proposal caused considerable trouble in the last regular session of legislature and finally ended when a majority bloc was formed to defeat the proposition. The majority of the legislators have been more partial to a state sales tax, comparable to that in force in Mississippi, but Governor Miller has not expressed himself on this question.

Foremost educators in Alabama have recently gone on record as saying that unless the legislature provided for additional revenue to be

DEANS PETRIE, DUNCAN, WILMORE TO CONTROL AUBURN TEMPORARILY

Ferguson Offers Resolution Asking Board Of Trustees To Borrow Funds From R. F. C.

The board of trustees of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute has named a faculty committee of three deans to take over the control of the school until a permanent president is chosen.

When the board met in Montgomery on Thursday last, the dean of the graduate school, Dr. George Petrie, the dean of the school of engineering, J. J. Wilmore and the dean of the extension department, Dr. L. N. Duncan, were chosen as members of a board of control.

The final report of the sub-committee on afairs was adopted with but one dissenting ballot, after C. S. Culver, of Gadsden, had tried in vain to have Dean Wilmore named as chairman of the control board and made temporary president of the institution.

Prior to the meeting Dr. George Petrie had been frequently mentioned as a temporary (if not permanent) president of Auburn. However, he had heard of the rumors and wired Governor Miller asking him to have his name eliminated from nomination as he was "absolutely and unequivocally unwilling to assume the presidential responsibilities at Auburn".

Dr. Duncan, likewise had been frequently mentioned as the probable new president, but he too, was quoted as saying that he did not wish the position.

Since the resignation of President Bradford Knapp was accepted by the board of trustees, feeling has run high as to whom should be appointed to fill the vacancy. Predicted trouble within the board on selecting a new president has so far failed to develop.

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE CALLS UPON ALABAMA FOR $15,000

Pettus And McCord Appeal To State Democrats To Give To Victory Campaign Fund

We are in receipt of a letter from Judge Leon McCord, of Montgomery, National Democratic Committeeman, and Edmund Pettus, Chairman of the State Democratic Committee, stating that the Democratic National Committee has called upon the Democrats of Alabama to contribute the sum of fifteen thousand dollars to be used by our party in the contest to further the cause of democracy.

The letter goes on to say:

"In this election, Mr. Hoover and the republican leaders are backed by the selfish interests. Those who have grown rich from the tariff wall built around our nation, and those favored few who have been the recipients of special favors will gladly contribute financially to keep Mr. Hoover and his appointees in office. Those false and fraudulent leaders are desperate. They seek to keep a strange-hold on the nation at any cost. In this campaign they will pay anything to hold and keep their offices.

"We seek to throw these extravagant, wasteful, false and fraudulent leaders from our temples of justice; we seek to elect Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, president, and Honorable John Nance Garner, vice- president; we seek to restore the republic to the people.

"Therefore, we appeal to you to contribute to this fund—The Victory Campaign Fund of the Democratic Party."

Signed: Edmund W. Pettus, Chairman State Democratic Committee.
Leon McCord, National Democratic Committeeman.

STATE'S COTTON YIELD TO BE LESS THAN LAST YEAR'S

Present Month Will Be Big Factor In Determining Yield

The Alabama cotton crop has arrived at the first of August in a "spotted" condition with much uncertainty as to final production or yield. Although no official estimate will be released until August 8, the concensus of opinion is that the state crop this year will be much less than that of 1931.

August—the critical crop month of the year—is in the future. The month has just arrived and close observers of cotton know that whether conditions during August will be a big factor in determiniing the amount of cotton harvested from Alabama cotton fields this fall.

While weather itself is a very important factor in cotton production, boll weevils, too, are important for boll weevil activities are influenced by August weather. This is especially true of the central and northern portions of the state, in view of the fact that south Alabama's cotton is further advanced.

As the drop advances attention is being focused upon it by spinners, merchants, bankers, and others along with farmers. The feeling is that with a smaller crop prices should advance and thereby offset part of the losses due to decreased production.

Corn, hay and other feed crops are very promising. The Acreage is larger and fair to good yields are expected, these however, will be determined, in most of the state, by future weather. Early corn and some of the other early feed crops are about made, but much can happen yet to most of the corn and also to other feed crops produced in Alabama. Recent weather has been favorable to crops in most of Alabama. There are, however, dry spots which need rain.

Federal authorities at Washington have named $60,500,000,000 as the nation's income for 1932. The 1928 and also the 1929 figures were $85,000,000,000. One-fourth of the income this year will go into government costs, which include federal, state, municipal, county, and local taxes. With this money schools will be run, roads built and maintained, and numerous other public services rendered.

Mrs. Wyatt, plainer, more horse-faced than ever in her expensive New York clothes, tried to patronize Sabra Cravat, but the Whipple blood was no match for the Marcy. The new money affected Mrs. Wyatt queerly. She became nervous, full of spleen, and the eastern doctors spoke to her of high blood pressure.

Sabra frankly envied these lucky ones. A letter from the adder-tongued Felice Venable to her daughter was characteristic of that awesome old matriarch. Sabra still dreaded to open her mother's letters. They always contained a sting.

"All this talk of oil and millions and every one in Oklahoma rolling in it. I'll be bound that you and that husband of yours haven't so much as enough to fill a lamp. Trust Yancey Cravat to get hold of the wrong piece of land. Well, at least you can't be disappointed. It has been like that from the day you married him, though you can't say your mother didn't warn you. I hope Donna will show more sense."

Donna, home after two years at Miss Dignum's on the Hudson, seemed indeed to be a granddaughter after Felice Venable's own heart. She was, in coloring, contour, manner, and outlook, so unlike the other Oklahoma girls—Czarina McKee, Gazelle Slaughter, Jewel Riggs, Maurine Turket—as to make that tortured, wind-deviled day of her birth on the Oklahoma prairie almost nineteen years age seem impossible. Even during her homecomings in the summer vacations she had about her an air of cool disdain together with a kind of disillusioned calculation very disconcerting to her former intimates, not to speak of her own family.

The other girls living in Osage and Oklahoma City and Guthrie and Wahoo were true products of the new raw Southwest country. They liked to dress in crude high colors—glaring pinks, cerise, yellow, red, vivid orange, magenta. They made up naively with white powder and big daubs of carmine on either cheek. The daughters of more wealthy parents drove their own cars in a day when this was considered rather daring for a woman. Donna came home tall, thin to the point of scrawniness in their opinion; sallow, unrouged, drawling, mysterious. She talked with an eastern accent, ignored the letter r, said eyether and nyether and rih'ally and altogether made herself poisonously unpopular with the girls and undeniably stirring to the boys. She paid very little heed to the clumsy attentions of the Oklahoma home-town lads, adopting toward them a serpent-of-the-Nile attitude very baffling to these frank and open-faced prairie products.

Her school days finished, and she a finished product of those days, she now looked about her coolly, calculatingly. Her mother she regarded with a kind of affectionate amusement.

"What a rotten deal you've had, Sabra dear," she would drawl. "Rih'ally, I don't see how you've stood it all these years."

Sabra would come to her own defense, goaded by something strangely hostile in herself toward this remote, disdainful offspring. "Stood what?"

"Oh—you know. This being a pioneer woman and a professional

"What a Rotten Deal You've Had, Sabra, Dear."

Marcy and head-held-high in spite of a bum of a husband."

"Donna Cravat, if you ever again dare to speak like that of your father I shall punish you, big as you are."

"Sabra darling, how can you punish a grown woman? You might slap me, and I wouldn't slap you back, of course. But I'd be terribly embarrassed for you. As for father—he is a museum piece. You know it."

"Your father is one of the greatest figures the Southwest has ever produced."

"Mm. Well, he's picturesque enough, I suppose. But I wish he hadn't worked so hard at it. And Cim! There's a brother! A great help to me in my career, the men folks of this quaint family."

"I wasn't aware that you were planning a career," Sabra retorted, very much in the manner of Felice Venable. "Unless getting up at noon, slopping around in a kimono most of the day, and lying in the hammock reading is called a career by Dignum graduates. If it is, you're the outstanding success of your class."

"Darling, I adore you when you get viperish and Venable like that. Perhaps you influenced me in my early youth. That's the new psychology, you know. You used to tell me about grandma trailing around in her white ruffled dimity wrappers and her high heels, never lifting a lily hand."

"At least your grandmother didn't consider it a career."

"Neither do I. This lovely flower-like head isn't so empty as you think, lolling in the front porch hammock. I know it's no use counting on father, even when he's not off on one of his mysterious jaunts. What is he doing, anyway? Living with some squaw? . . . Forgive me, mother darling. I didn't mean to hurt you . . . Cim's just as bad, and worse, because he's weak and hasn't even dad's phony ideals. You're busy with the paper. That's all right. I'm not blaming you. If it weren't for you we'd all be on the town—or back in Wichita living on grandma in genteel poverty. I think you're wonderful, and I ought to try to be like you. But I don't want to be a girl reporter. Describing the sumptuous decorations of dandelions and sunflowers at one of Cassandra Sipes' parties."

Goaded by curiosity and a kind of wonder at this unnatural creature, Sabra must put her question: "What do you want to do, then?"

"I want to marry the richest man in Oklahoma, and build a palace that I'll hardly ever live in, and travel like royalty, and clank with emeralds. With my skin and hair they're my stone."

"Oh, emeralds, by all means," Sabra agreed, cuttingly. "Diamonds are so ordinary. And the gentleman that you consider honoring—let me see. From your requirements that would have to be Tracy Wyatt, wouldn't it?"

"Yes,' replied Donna, calmly.

"You've probably overlooked Mrs. Wyatt. Of course, Tracy's only fifty-one, and you being nineteen, there's plenty of time if you'll just be patient." She was too amused to be really disturbed.

"I don't intend to be patient, mamma darling."

Something in her hard, ruthless tone startled Sabra. "Donna Cravat, don't you start any of your monkey business. I saw you cooing and ah-ing at him the other day when we went over the Wyatts' new house. And I heard you saying some drivel about his being a man that craved beauty in his life, and that he should have it; and sneering politely at the new house until I could see him beginning to doubt everything in it, poor fellow. He had been so proud to show it. But I thought you were just talking that New York talk of yours."

"I wasn't. I was talking business."

Sabra was revolted, alarmed, and distressed, all at once. She gained reassurance by telling herself that this was just one of Donna's queer jokes—part of the streak in her that Sabra had never understood and that corresponded to the practical joker in Yancey. That, too, had always bewildered her. Absorbed in the workings of the growing, thriving newspaper the conversation faded to a dim and almost unimportant memory.

Sabra was sufficiently shrewd and level headed to take Sol Levy's sound advice. "You settle down to running your paper, Sabra, and you won't need any oil wells. You can have the best-paying paper and the most powerful in the Southwest. Bigger than Houston or Dallas or San Antonio. Because Osage is going to be bigger and richer than any of them. You mark what I say. Hardly any oil in the town of Osage, but billions of barrels of oil all around it. This town won't be torn to pieces, then. It'll grow and grow. Five years from now it'll look like Chicago."

"Oh, Sol, how can that be?"

"You'll see. There where the gambling tent stood with a mud hole in front of it a few years ago you'll see in another five years a skyscraper like those in New York."

She laughed at that.

Just as she had known that Yancey had again left her on that night of the Mescal ceremony, so now she sensed that he would come back in the midst of this new insanity that had seized all Oklahoma. And come back he did, from God knows where, on the very crest of the oil wave, and bringing with him news that overshadowed his return. He entered as he had left, with no word of explanation, so bizarre as to cause everything else to fade into the background.

He came riding, as always, but it was a sorry enough nag that he bestrode this time; and his white sombrero was grimed and battered, the Prince Albert coat was spotted, the linen frayed, the whole figure covered with the heavy red dust of the trampled road. He must have ridden like an avenging angel, for his long black locks were damp, his eyes red rimmed. And when she saw this Don Quixote, so sullied, so shabby, her blood turned to water within her veins for pity.

She thought, it will always be like this as long as he lives, and each time he will be a little more broken, older, less and less the figure of splendor I married, until at last . . .

She only said, "Yancey," quietly.

He was roaring, he was reeling with Jovian laughter as he strode into the Wigwam office where she sat at her neat orderly desk just as she had sat on that day years before. For a dreadful moment she thought that he was drunk or mad. He flung his soiled sombrero to the desk top, he swept her into his arms, he set her down.

"Sabra! Here's news for you. Jesse! Heh, Jesse! Where's that rum-soaked son of a printer's devil? Jesse! Come in here! G—d, I've been laughing so that I almost rolled off my horse." He was striding up and down as of old, his shabby coat tails spreading with the vigor of his movements, the beautiful hands gesticulating, the fine eyes—bloodshot now—still flashing with the fire that would burn until it consumed him.

"Oil, my children! More oil than anybody ever thought there was in any one spot in the world. And where! Where! On the Osage Indian reservation. It came in an hour ago, like the ocean. It makes every other field look like the Sahara. There never was such a joke! It's cosmic—it's terrible. How the gods must be roaring. 'Laughter unquenchable among the blessed gods!'"

"Yancey dear, we're used to oil out here. It's an old story. Come now. Come home and have a hot bath and clean clothes." In her mind's eye she saw those fine white linen shirts of his all neatly stacked in the drawer as he had left them.

For answer he reached out with one great arm and swept a pile of exchanges, copy paper, galley proofs, and clippings off the desk, while with the other hand he seized the typewriter by its steel bar and plumped it to the floor with a force that wrung a protesting whine and zing from its startled insides. He had always scorned to use a typewriter. The black swathes of his herculean pencil bit deeper into the paper's surface than any typewriter's metal teeth.

"Hot bath! Hot h—l, honey! Do you realize what this means? Do you understand that two thousand Osage Indians, squatting in their rags in front of their miserable shanties, are now the richest nation in the world? In the world, I tell you. They were given that land—the barest, meanest desert land in the whole of the Oklahoma country. And the government of these United States said, 'There, you red dogs, take that and live on it. And if you can't live on it, then die on it.' God A'mighty, I could die myself with laughing. Millions and millions of dollars. They're spattering, I tell you, all over the Osage reservation. There's no stopping that flow. Every buck and squaw on the Osage reservation is a millionaire. They own that land, and, by G—d, I'm going to see that no one takes it away from them!"

"Oh, Yancey, be careful."

He was driving his pencil across the paper. "Send this out A. P. They tried to keep it dark when the flow came, but I'll show them. Sabra, kill your editorial lead, whatever it was. I'll write it. Make this your news lead, too. Listen. 'The gaudiest star-spangled cosmic joke that ever was played on a double-dealing government burst into fireworks today when, with a roar that could be heard for miles around, thousands of barrels of oil shot into the air on the miserable desert land known as the Osage Indian reservation and occupied by those duped and wretched—!"

"We can't use that, I tell you."

"Why not?"

"This isn't the Cimarron. It's the state of Oklahoma. That's treason—that's anarchy—"

"It's the truth. It's history. I can prove it. They'll be down on those Osages like a pack of wolves. At least I'll let them know they're expected. I'll run the story, by G—d, as I want it run, and they can shoot me for it."

"And I say you won't. You can't come in here like that. I'm editor of this paper."

He turned quietly and looked at her, the great head jutting out, the eyes like steel. "Who is?"

"I am."

Without a word he grasped her wrist and led her out, across the old porch, down the steps and into the street. There, on Pawhuska avenue, in the full glare of noonday, he pointed to the weather-worn sign that he himself, aided by Jesse Rickey, had hung there almost twenty years before. She had had it painted and repainted. She had had it repaired. She had never replaced it with another.

THE OKLAHOMA WIGWAM
Yancey Cravat Prop. and Editor.

"When you take that down, Sabra, honey, and paint your own name up in my place, you'll be the editor of this newspaper. Until you do that, I am."

As they stood there, she in her neat blue serge, he in his crumpled and shabby attire, she knew that she never would do it.

* * * * * * *

Young Cim came home from Colorado for the summer vacation, was caught up in the oil flood, and never went back. With his geological knowledge, slight as it was, and his familiarity with the region, he was shuttled back and forth from one end of the state to the other. Curiously enough Cim, like his father, was more an onlooker than a participant in this fantastic spectacle. The quality of business acumen seemed to be lacking in both these men; or perhaps a certain mad fastidiousness in them kept them from taking part in the feverish fight. A hint of oil in this corner, a trace of oil in that, and the thousands were upon it, pushing, scrambling, nose to the ground, down on all-fours like pigs in a trough. A hundred times Yancey could have bought an oil lease share for a song. Head lolling on his breast, lids lowered over the lightning eyes, he shrugged indifferent shoulders.

"I don't want the filthy muck," he said. "It stinks. Let the Indians have it. It's theirs. And the 'Big Boys' from the East—let them sweat and scheme for it. They know where Oklahoma is now, all right."

His comings and goings had ceased to cause Sabra the keen agony of earlier days. She knew now that their existence, so long as Yancey lived, would always be made up of just such unexplained absences and melodramatic homecomings. She had made up her mind to accept the inevitable.

She did not mind that Yancey spent much time on the oil fields. He knew the men he called the "Big Boys" from the East, and they often sought him out for his company, which they found amusing, and for a certain regional wisdom that they considered valuable. He despised them and spent most of his time with the pumpers and roustabouts, drillers and tool dressers and shooters—a hard-drinking, hard-talking, hard-fighting crew. In his white sombrero and his outdated Prince Albert and his high-heeled boots he was known as a picturesque character. Years of heavy drinking were taking their toll of the magnificent body and mind. The long locks showed streaks of gray.

Local townsmen who once had feared and admired him began to patronize him or to laugh at him, tolerantly. Many of them were rich now, counting their riches not in thousands but in millions. They had owned a piece of Oklahoma dirt, or a piece of a piece of dirt—and suddenly, through no act of theirs, it was worth its weight in diamonds. Pat Leary, the pugnacious little Irish lawyer who had once been a section hand in the early days of the building of the Santa Fe road, was now so rich through his vast oil holdings that his Indian wife, Crook Nose, was considered a quaint and picturesque note by the wives of eastern operators who came down on oil business.

After the first shrill excitement of it Sabra Cravat relinquished the hope of making sudden millions as other luckier ones had done. Her land had yielded no oil; she owned no oil leases. It was a curious fact that Sabra still queened it in Osage and had actually become a power in the state. The paper was read, respected, and feared throughout the Southwest. It was said with pride by Osage's civic minded that no oil was rich enough to stain the pages of the Oklahoma Wigwam. Though few realized it, and though Sabra herself never admitted it, it was Yancey who had made this true. He neglected it for years together, but he always turned up in a crisis, whether political, economic, or social, to hurl his barbed editorials at the heads of the offenders, to sting with the poison of his ridicule. He championed the Indians, he denounced the oil kings, he laughed at the money grabbers, he exposed the land thieves. He was afraid of nothing. He would absent himself for six months. The Wigwam would run along smoothly, placidly. He would return, torch in hand, and again set fire to the paper until the town, the county, the state were ablaze. The Osages came to him with their legal problems, and he advised them soundly and took a minimum fee. He seemed always to sense an important happening from afar and to emerge, growling like an old lion, from his hidden jungle lair, broken, mangy, but fighting, the fine eyes still alight, the magnificent head still as menacing as that of a buffalo charging. He had, on one occasion, come back just in time to learn of Dixie Lee's death.

Dixie had struck oil and had retired, a rich woman. She had closed her house and gone to Oklahoma City, and there she bought a house in a decent neighborhood and adopted a baby girl. She had gone to Kansas City for it, and though she had engaged a capable and somewhat bewildered nurse on that trip, Dixie herself carried the child home in her arms, its head close against the expensive satin bosom.

No one knew what she had used to pull the wool over the eyes of the Kansas City authorities. She never could have done it in Oklahoma. She had had the child almost a year when the women of Osage got wind of it. They say she took it out herself in its perambulator daily, and perhaps some one recognized her on the street, though she looked like any plump and respectable matron now, in her rich, quiet dress and her pince nez, a little gray showing in the black abundant hair.

Sabra Cravat heard of it. Mrs. Wyatt. Mrs. Doc Nisbett. Mrs. Pack.

They took the child away from her by law. Six months later Dixie Lee died; the sentimental said of a broken heart. It was Yancey Cravat who wrote her obituary:

"Dixie Lee, for years one of the most prominent citizens of Osage and a pioneer in the early days of Oklahoma, having made the Run in '89, one of the few women who had the courage to enter that historic and terrible race, is dead.

"She was murdered by the good women of Osage. . . ."

The story was a nine-days' wonder, even in that melodramatic state. Sabra read it, white faced. The circulation of the Wigwam took another bound upward.

Interesting Picture of Birth of Solar System

Tracing time and its changes back to the very beginning of things, Sir James Jeans of Cambridge gives, in a recently published work, a wonderful picture of the birth of our solar system as the result of a collision some 2,000,000,000 years ago.

"A second star, wandering blindly through space, happened to come within hailing distance of the sun. Just as the sun and moon raise tides on the earth, so this second star must have raised tides on the surface of the sun . . . a huge tidal wave must have traveled over the surface of the sun, ultimately forming a mountain of prodigious height, which would rise even higher and higher as the cause of the disturbance came nearer and nearer. And, before the second star began to recede, its tidal pull had become so powerful that this mountain was torn to pieces and threw off small fragments of itself, much as the crest of a wave throws off spray. These small fragments have been circulating around their parent sun ever since. They are the planets, great and small, of which our earth is one."

Owl in Squirrel Nest

The long-eared owl is of medium size with extremely long ear tufts. They live throughout temperate North America and breed south to Virginia, Arkansas, northern Texas and southern California, spend the winter in most of their range and south to central Mexico. The nest, says Nature Magazine, may be that of some large bird or a squirrel, carelessly repaired; it is usually in a dense growth of evergreen trees and placed from ten to twenty feet up. They are very beneficial, for their food consists largely of meadow mice and other small mammals, insects, spiders, crayfish, small snakes; frogs, snails and earthworms are known to be taken as well.

Here's Really New Idea for Christmas Present

Here is an advertisement which appeared recently in one of the largest of Berlin's dailies, as transcribed in the magazine Lu, Paris:

"A German writer of world-wide reputation will write the story of the life of anyone who may desire it, in a manner guaranteed to be artistic, based on personal notes of those who wish to order.

"It is the nicest sort of present for Christmas. Such a story would bring joy to the entire family. Before this, one could not have offered the story of one's life to one's friends or acquaintances. The price depends on the number of pages."

"The 'world-wide' reputation of this writer is questionable," remarks the Paris magazine, "but he did not speculate unwisely. Many persons might like to have a true history of their own lives, and pay handsomely for it if it were interesting (from their point of view). To see oneself the hero of a novel! The idea is attractive."

Victorian Morals

Frederic Lonsdale, the English playwright, said at a Hollywood tea:

"Victorian morals, like the husband, were too good to be true. Every now and then a book of Victorian memoirs comes out, and we read things about Carlyle and Tennyson and Dickens that remind us of the young man on the moonlit beach.

"This young man crushed a pretty girl to his heart, kissed her like mad for half an hour, and then said:

"'Darling, yours are the first lips I have ever kissed—the first and the sweetest.'"

Lightning Freak

A perfect picture of a tree, showing branches and leaves, was imprinted on the chest of Jack Walsh, one of two men killed by a lightning bolt near Philadelphia. Walsh was standing under a tree when it was hit by the bolt and the electricity was discharged in equal density from all parts of the tree to the spot on Walsh's chest, so that a small image of the tree was thus burned on the body.

Thad Holt, director of the Alabama Industrial Development Board, has been named by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to serve as field representative of the emergency relief division.

Tuscaloosa will ask the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for $60,000 to enlarge its present waterworks system. The waterworks is owned by the city, and is operated at a profit, it was stated.

Application for establishment of an agricultural credit corporation to serve this land bank district will be made to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under terms of the unemployment relief bill.

Principals of the 11 state secondary agricultural schools were in consultation in Montgomery with Dr. A. F. Harman, state superintendent of education, and his administrative assistants preparing tenative budgets for the ensuing school year.

What promises to be the outstanding entertainment and social event of the sixteenth annual convention of the Alabama Merchants Association will be the annual convention grand ball at the Hollywood Country Club, Birmingham, on Wednesday night, Aug. 24.

A subcommittee of six Auburn trustees appointed to nominate a successor to Dr. Bradford Knapp, resigned president of Alabama Polytechnic Institute, conferred behind closed doors for three hours in Gov. B. M. Miller's office, and adjourned without making public their decisions

Says WILL ROGERS

BEVERLY HILLS.—See where Mr. Hoover and almost his entire cabinet held a meeting to decide where to move the bonus army. The democrats are holding a meeting to decide where to move Mr. Hoover and his cabinet. Everybody wants to do something with somebody else.

I see by this mornings paper where "living" has decreased 7 per cent since December. In figuring these statistics, (and by the way who is it that figures up all these fool things?). Well anyhow, you might live that much cheaper, but that dont figure in the worry. If worry is worth anything, we never was living as expensive.

Too bad this affair in Washington, personally, I think the whole idea of this pilgrimage was ill advised, and no doubt did their cause harm, but they have their side of it too. They have the same right there as any other "lobbyist."

Well all I know is just what I read in the papers, and what I see as I mess around. Well with us right in the middle of the Olympics, we are just bogged down in swimmers, up to our ears in pole vaulters. Its been great fun, and a wonderful sight to see. Nothing like it during our lifetime, and wont be here again in many a year. Course it will during my lifetime, being a young guy, but you old birds wont ever see it again, unless you hit the high seas.

About ten days ago before it started why one day out at our studio they brought all the girl athletes out there for lunch and to see the studio. We have a big cafe, and it was full. You musent miss meeting this Texas wildcat "Tex" Dickinson, she just believes that she can do anything, and the funny part about it is she can. There is none of the sports that she cant do and do well. She is an athletic marvel. Played ten games of golf and makes it in 82. They say thats pretty good. I dont play the game, but they say it is. She is within three fifths of a second of Helen Madison's record. This old Texas girl said she would ride, rope, or play polo against me, and I bet she could beat me in any of em.

Then I met that day Helen Madison, our great swimmer, then Georgie Coleman, Oh and dozens of others. A big pretty blonde girl from Germany spoke good English, said she was a javelin thrower. Javelin? Why that's a little light thing like a spear. Why this girl could have heaved a horse, much less a javelin.

Two girls from Mexico, one was a fencer, one was a javelin thrower. The Canadian girls I believe as a whole were about the prettiest of any of our foreign visitors. And they had on the most attractive sweaters. The Japanese had a great bunch, and funny thing there was only one girl from France, just one here. I guess France is kinder slow having women taking up boxing, and wrestling, and running and jumping. Still they dont mind em doing a lot of work in the fields. I have seen em pitching hay and hauling manure to the fields.

Get this for a laugh. First event on Olympic program weight lifting. Both light and heavy. Each event won by Frenchman, one was a dancing teacher, the other a dealer in a gambling house. Best showing at opening was by Canada, second by Italy, third Argentine, and today one hundred and five thousand people are looking for the ladies milliner that put those French "berets" on our American boys. Those "boudwoir caps" are bad enough on a Frenchman, but on an American athlete they are a scream. Only test of endurance at the opening was ten thousand meter prayer. A man with a short prayer could get booking for life. Just at these national events.

We have a great bunch out here prowling around. It's the National Editorial Association, composed of editors in smaller towns and weekly publications. They are having a good time, and getting a lot of pleasure out of it. And giving every one that meets 'em a close-up of just about as representative gang of Americans as would be possible to band together—intelligent, well read, and no national advertising controls their pages.

They are not conceited enough to think they "mould public opinion." They just go along and service their community with the most indispensable article that it has. And yet their real power is greater than all your metropolitan dailies combined. Any person that don't read at least one well-written country newspaper is not truly informed.

A New Monroe Doctrine
All in the Mind
Just Down the Street
Honor the Swiss

Paraguay and Bolivia may, after all, not enjoy their "real war." Young gentlemen of Paraguay and Bolivia are "rushing to the colors," eager to fight somebody. In Paraguay, young women, "including debutantes and society ladies," insist on joining the army. They won't knit or do homework, but insist on fighting in the front line trenches, and if there are no trenches they will dig some. But the South American ladies and gentlemen may miss the "pleasure" of finding out what a real war is like.

The United States has joined with South American countries in declaring that it will not "recognize territorial gains made by armed force."

(This means a sort of Monroe doctrine among countries in South America. It would hardly be worth while to fight for land if you couldn't enjoy it after you got it.)

Everything is comparative. When they broke Ravaillac on the wheel, because he had murdered Henry the Fourth, he laughed after one of his legs had been broken a few times, and explained to the executioner that he laughed because he did not feel the blow, after the first few fractures.

In the depths of hell, Lucifer tells his followers that they can make themselves comfortable in their new abode by working and thinking, and, in Milton's fine verse, that everything is in the mind, which can make a hell of heaven, or a heaven of hell.

Mr. Knudsen of Detroit, automobile manufacturer, and Aylesworth, boss of National Broadcasting, eating tete de veau a la vinaigrette at New York's Ritz Carlton hotel, decided that better times are coming back, not around the corner, but marching up the street.

It is a fact that the news is more hopeful than it has been in two years past.

The Swiss at home, and in their churches all over the world, recently celebrated the six hundred and forty-first anniversary of the foundation of the Swiss confederation.

It was an old republic, and a successful one. It went through the big war without fighting, borrowing or lending, with not a soldier trespassing on Swiss soil.

Switzerland is respected, because she always keeps ready. Every Swiss knows how to use a gun, and must prove every year, until he reaches middle age, that he still knows how to use it, and has it in good order, with ammunition.

Many believe that when work starts throughout the country, with old-time energy, there will be, for a time, lower wages, in all directions low enough to tempt investment by employers, with reasonably certain profits on the investment. Even in Russia, labor cannot hire itself. That would require real co-operation, and the world is several centuries removed from anything of that kind. Selfishness will long remain the world's chief mainspring.

Already the change is seen. Farmers can hire good workers for $20 to $25 a month and board. In Wisconsin unskilled labor is abundant at 20 cents an hour.

Lower wages necessarily mean slower recovery of old-fashioned prosperity. It is not the bosses' profits but the spending of workers' earnings that create good times.

President Hoover is preparing plans for promotion of the five-day working week—the "flexible week," it is called. It is believed that the five-day plan would provide jobs for 3,000,000 men now idle.

At the beginning, of course, the five-day man would get a five-day salary. But once the five-day week is established it will be a week as well paid as the six-day week used to be, just as the eight-hour day is as well and better paid in good times now than the old ten-hour day.

In Spain, Manuel Azana, prime minister and minister of war, talks refreshing common sense. He expects to spend fifteen million dollar a year on the national air force, a good deal of money for Spain, and says: "We are against war as an international instrument, but we must be prepared to defend ourselves."

Many farm products have recently increased in price—corn 2 cents a bushel, oats 3 cents, barley 4 cents, wheat 5, rye 7, hay $1.50 a ton, potatoes 5 cents a bushel, sweet potatoes 15 cents, apples 25 cents, and hogs, which is most important, $1.70 a hundredweight.

Increases also in beef, veal, lamb, sheep, chickens, eggs, butter, butterfat, wool, milk cows, up $3 per head, horses $5 per head, mules $2 per head.

Another joy day in Wall Street. Stocks up, bonds "continuing to advance." Those that would not buy them near the bottom will probably proceed to buy them timidly now. Later they will buy them voraciously, when the bargain days have passed.

Human Side of Apes

Apes display several human passions. The gorilla will fly into a fearful rage. The orang is wonderfully affectionate to its young. Gibbons have a sense of humor. They delight in mischievous play and, being tailless, will, when they have the chance, pull other monkey's tails as a great joke. Chimpanzees have a gift which dogs have never been known to display—they can see a picture of themselves as a picture. They will recognize their own portraits, or grow excited if shown a study of a bunch of bananas. Among the gifts or powers which man possesses and apes lack it is remarkable that man can weep, but apes cannot.

Evened Up

Diner—Hey, waiter, there's no turtle in this soup.

Waiter—No, and there's no horse in the horseradish.

Making Up His Case

Judge—Would you like a lawyer?

Negro Prisoner—No, sah, but Ah would like a couple witnesses.

Something said by one man to another spreads with great rapidity and can soon become what is called public opinion.

Life-Insurance Protection

Life insurance premiums in the United States absorb 4 per cent of the total national income, according to an article by Mary Dublin reviewed in Social Science Abstracts. At the close of 1929 there was $113,000,000,000 of life insurance in force in this country, which was almost three times that carried in all other countries in the world. Though most persons who carry insurance are inadequately insured, it is pointed out, protection is much more general among the upper income groups than among the wage-earning population.

Gardening Gossip

The home garden is a place to cultivate patience," says a nature writer. Personally we never had much success with that crop.

MR. MILES SUGGESTION SHOULD BE ADOPTED

Oliver Miles, Clerk of the Board of Revenue, struck a resounding chord in the hearts of the people, when he recommended in his semi-annual report last week, further retrenchment in County expenses. Suggestions embodied in his report to the Board were that all members of the Board including himself as Clerk, take a voluntary cut in salary, and to save the county every possible expense that could be well gotten around.

Mr. Miles' salary has already been cut once this year to one-half of what he originally made. Yet, in the face of this, he offers the suggestion of a further reduction, expressing his willingness to assume an additional 20 per cent reduction.

This is real public service, Mr. Miles, and we feel sure that the County will appreciate your attitude, and that the Board will favor your suggestions, and will do all in its power to meet present circumstances without unjust injury to anyone.

Columbiana, Alabama,
July 15, 1932.

To the Honorable Board of Revenue of Shelby County,
Columbiana, Alabama.
Gentlemen:

You will please find attached a report of receipts and disbursements with a schedule of indebtedness, for the half year ended June 30th, 1932; and although I have made a few explanatory notes in the body of the report, I am going to take the liberty of adding several recommendations and suggestions:

You have reduced the County debt during this six months by more than $30,000.00 as shown on page 7, there being included in this amount the sum of $10,000, principal, and $1,620.00 interest on the Newell indebtedness created in 1913, originally amounting to over $4,000 and which is now happily about to pass forever out of our calculations. The other cancelled obligations were for current expenses, payment having been delayed for lack of funds.

I wonder if there are many other administrations which have done so well in the face of such obstacles as have confronted Shelby County.

However, there is a depressing circumstance which I must call to your attention. The receipts which justified the payment of the debts referred to, and which gave you the capital and credit to finance your current expenses, were based upon assessments made in 1930, when prosperity conditions, to put it mildly, were unexpected.

Since then, values have been destroyed; you have reduced valuations to an extent undreamed of five years ago, and the only absolute certainty existing today in your calculations is that you positively cannot meet your expenses out of your income.

With these conditions confronting us, I have no other recourse than to recommend another adjustment of your affairs in line with conditions as they are, considering the drastic decrease in your receipts and the certainty that they cannot be temporarily remedied by borrowing; which we have been able to resort to in the past.

I have been charged with instigating the reductions in salaries and allowances which you authorized last October, and while this charge is unfounded, I am willing to assume responsibility for a revision which is here respectfully recommended.

Beginning with January my compensation was cut in half; and although the Board's PER DIEM could not be legally reduced, each of the members has donated four days per month which were served without pay; this being in effect a reduction of approximately 20 per cent from the normal remuneration, and there was also an attempt to reduce other fees, salaries and allowances proportionately. But an examination of the records reveals that all of these efforts have not, and will not keep pace with the diminishing returns from taxation and other sources of revenue, and that we cannot hope for a balanced budget without further restrictions upon expenditures.

As you know, there can be no legal reduction in the pay of an official during the term for which he is elected. But other countries no more fortunately situated than Shelby have received the voluntary CONTRIBUTIONS of their patriotic servants, and I cannot believe that our own will fail us when the extent of the crisis is realized.

With this in mind I suggest that your Board inaugurate a drive for further retrenchment. That as a beginning you reduce your clerk's salary 20 per cent; that each member of the Board undertake to receive as per diem and mileage an amount 20 per cent less than his compensation as shown in this report; and that every official, employee and servant of the county, whether his compensation be fixed by law or not, be requested to donate 20 per cent of his salary, fees or other remuneration back to the county treasury.

In the event that it should be contended that this would be an illegal act, or that it cannot be accomplished on account of the difficulties of book keeping, accounting or other technical objections, I may state that its legality has been passed upon by competent authority, and that the matter of accounting will present no problem which cannot be readily solved.

In short, the only obstacle will be in gaining the cooperation of the parties interested, and I have no plan to bring this about except to ask them to meet with the Board at the earliest opportunity for a frank and friendly discussion of conditions, when I believe you will find a majority, at least, ready to do everything in their power for the general good.

Respectfully submitted,
OLIVER MILES, Clerk

THIS IS NO TIME TO SLAP CRIMINALS ON THE WRIST

The United States Government should immediately proceed to secure indictments against those citizens of Alexandria Bay, N. Y., who assaulted government agents, destroyed government property, and interfered with the administration of government authority at that place on July 12 and 14, 1932.

These assaulted agents represented the people of the United States. They were custodians of the dignity and prestige of the federal government. A blow at them was a blow directly against the interest and safety of every patriotic citizen in the country. It should be so regarded by federal authorities.

The incidents have been widely discussed and there has been a great deal of publicity given statements by men professing to represent the citizens of Alexandria Bay, most of whom, as a matter of fact, greatly deplore the affair. A brief review of the facts is advisable:

On July 4th and 10th purchases of liquor were made at various places in Alexandria Bay by Agents of the United States government. On July 12th, search warrants were issued and executed that same day by eight agents. In executing the warrant directed against one place, it was necessary to force a door and while axamination was being made approximately thirty men tried to gain admittance. On leaving the premises, the agents making this particular investigation were threatened by a mob of several hundred hoodlums, who not only cursed and abused, but assaulted them. Agent Lengyel was dragged across the street from his car, struck about the head, arms, and shoulders, knocked down and kicked in the side, arms, shoulders and legs, suffering severely. A Spanish-American war convention was in progress and several of the veterans of this organization came to Lengyel's rescue, taking him from the mob; likewise rescuing Agent Norris who was struck in the face, thrown to the pavement and kicked before he received help. The state police arrived and upon examination it was found that automobile tires and other government property had been destroyed. The federal agents were unarmed.

Meanwhile, other places were being raided and prisoners taken, and as these were being removed from Alexandria Bay, the investigators were threatened with death.

On the next day, July 13th, one of the investigators made another purchase of intoxicating liquor in the speakeasy which had been the scene of the assaults upon the agents the day previous. A search warrant was issued as well as a warrant for another place in Alexandria Bay. Nine agents were assigned to their execution. At one of the speakeasies raided, certain property including an old stand, a window, a chair, and a cash register were demolished, whether by the agents or by the members of the mob which subsequently gathered is unknown. At the other speakeasy, it was necessary to force a large, double-planked, electrically-operated door. Two men were arrested and liquors seized. The agents made a thorough search of this place and to do this it was necessary to discover secret compartments in which liquors were cached. The bar was tipped over and under it was found such a compartment. A cupboard was removed from the wall, and wall board broken. Meanwhile, a mob was gathering, which state police tried to disperse. When the agents left the place and entered their car, officers of the state police posted themselves on the running board and directed them to proceed thru the mob. A woman stepped directly in front of Agent Bournemann's car and claims to have been injured, altho she walked away without difficulty. Taking advantage of trivial incident, a warrant was issued against Bournemann for reckless driving and a man claiming to be the chief of police, accompanied by a Mr. Savage, intercepted Bournemann's car while en route to Watertown, N. Y., and attempted to take him into custody. Meanwhile another agent, in a following government car was struck in the face and attempts were made to pull two investigators from the car. A known bootlegger, trying to climb into the car from the bumper, was thrown off when the clutch suddenly engaged at the time the agent driving was struck in the face.

The sole charge against these agents is that they destroyed property in these places. It is by no means certain that they destroyed any property other than incidentally in an effort to locate concealed places. It is quite possible that the comparatively slight damage actually occurred at the hands of members of the mob which poured into the places after the agents had left them.

If, however, these agents did show a certain disrogard for the property of the proprietors of these speakeasies, it was nothing more than an exhibition of human nature. Their comrades in arms had been wantonly and violently assaulted in a most cruel manner on the previous visit to the town and it would possibly be too much to expect that they would be particularly gentle in handling the property of the men directly or indirectly responsible.

Newspaper photographers took pictures of the scenes and a publicity campaign was immediately gotten under way for the purpose of using the incident against the prohibition policy and to the injury of the agents.

These is every reason to believe that a political motive is involved in much of this publicity. Certainly a number of men responsible for it are candidates for office.

The incident affords a most favorable opportunity for the United States government to demonstrate that agents of its authority cannot be assaulted with impunity, and that administration of the federal laws will be effectively carried out, any interference therewith being promptly and adequately punished.

Other Newspapers Say

GET ACQUAINTED

Recently this paper published a summary of the much favored Democratic platform adopted at the Democratic convention. Press reports state that this platform, as it stands, is without a doubt, the choice of the people of the United States.

Get acquainted with these platforms. Following are some comments from various newspaper over the United States, regarding the Democratic and Republican platforms. It will be noticed that several of the newspapers quoted are Republican papers:

G. O. P. Prohibition Straddle

"Nicholas Murray Butler condemns it because it is dry; Senator Borah condemns it because it is wet; the American people will condemn it because it is a fraud."—Senator Alben W. Barkley's keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention.

Progressing Progressives

Senator Norris (Rep., Nebr.): "I won't support President Hoover on any platform."

Senator Frazier (Rep., N. D.): "I cannot support President Hoover on that platform. It provides nothing for agriculture or unemployment relief and straddles on prohibition."

The Country at Stake—Pity Mr. Hoover? Of course. He's pitiful. He's pathetic, but it is more pathetic that our fortunes should be in his hands at this grave crisis which he says is worse than that of the war. Reelect him? I cannot imagine anything worse for the American electorate to do . . . But the time has really passed for any consideration of the man. What is at stake is the country.—Oswald Garrison Villard in The Nation.

The Party of Clarity

It (the repeal plank) represents the first direct and unequivocal utterance on the subject of prohibition which any major party convention has made since the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted. It stamps the Democratic party as the party of clarity and courage on this controversial issue and it bespeaks a quality of decision that ought to stand the party in good stead not only in connection with the prohibition issue but also with respect to every other issue arising during this year's campaign.—Baltimore Sun (Dem.)

Straight-Out and Honest

This Democratic plank, so simple and clear-cut and direct, would give a new aspect to the whole Presidential campaign. Great numbers of Republicans have expressed their disgust with the uncertain sound of their own party's trumpet on the question of prohibition. They have said that they long for a straight-out and honest utterance. President Butler went so far as to predict that if the Democrats would come out openly and courageously for repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment they would attract 6,000,000 votes from the Republican camp.—New York Times, (Ind. Dem.)

Model Political Plank

It (the repeal plank) is the longest plank and the clearest. Enough words are used to remove any possibility of doubt. It strikes the proper medium between brevity that causes ambiguity and such prolixity causing confusion as the Republican plank on prohibition displayed. It is, in our judgment, a model political plank.—New York Herald Tribune (Rep.).

"No Citizen Could Ask More"

The prohibition plank in the draft of the Democratic platform is a model of clarity and directness. Both qualities are welcome after the deliberate obfuscations of the Republican yes-no-and-maybe stand on the wet-dry issue. No citizen could ask more.—Philadelphia Record (Dem.)

Unique in Clarity and Courage

The platform (Democratic) is the shortest, the clearest and the best advanced by either of the two parties in recent times. On prohibition repeal and Volstead modification it goes all the way. On economic issues in the main it is boldly progressive. As a whole and as a major party platform it is unique in its clarity and its courage.—Washington News (Ind.)

A Noble Experiment

The Democratic party has gone far across the Rubicon on the question of repeal of the eighteenth amendment. It not only commits itself and its candidates to repeal, but "pending Repeal," it demands immediate modification of the Volstead act. It is a noble experiment. cratic national convention has the The platform adopted by the Demomerit of clearness and brevity. It bears the marks of master hands.—Washington Post (Rep.).

"Best Thing of Its Kind"

The majority plank adopted by the Democrats . . . is the best thing of its kind we have ever seen.—New York Evening Post (Rep.)

Expresses Majority Sentiment of United States

We believe the Democratic platform expresses in its prohibition plank the majority sentiment of the country.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Democrats Should Feel Proud

Democrats the country over should thrill with pride at the clean-cut manner in which their party has met the greatest issue in American politics today.—Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch (Dem.).

It is not necessary for this newspaper to continually remind its readers of the past four years of poverty and unfulfilled promises for farmers' relief. The people are crying "We want a change!" The time for consideration of which party shall be in power is secondary. Our country is at stake. "Our country" includes the State of Alabama, it includes this county, and each individual. The best and nearest aid is at the ballot boxes in the coming election.

The Democratic Party has stood aside, offering its aid at all times to assist the present administration in bringing the country out of this mess. Such aid has been fought. The Democratic Party now stands before the people with a platform that stands to reason it is above any question or doubt. It has in it all those things for the people, carrying out the statement of Franklin D. Roosevelt, . . . restore to the people."—Chilton County News.

25 Years Ago In Columbiana

Tom Norris, who is working as a relief operator at Randolph, spent a short while in Columbiana Sunday with his parents.

Will Page left last week for Talladega where he will manage the livery business for Mr. R. L. Buckhanan. Will is a fine business man and will make Mr. Buchannan a good manager.

Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch will be played in the School Auditorium Friday night. The proceeds are to be used for the Public School library and the music for the occasion will be furnished by Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Roberts and the three Misses Chapman.

There will be a horse-swapping convention held in Columbiana next Saturday, Jan. 26. Come and bring your swapping stock and have a good time among the boys.

Circuit Clerk John R. Dyke spent several days on his farm near Sterrett last week.

McMillan and Haynes moved their law offices last week into the Liles building on the corner of Main and East College Street.

The Bell Telephone Company has reached this place and now Columbiana has long-distance connection with Montgomery and Birmingham and other cities.

The post office was moved to the Longshore building adjoining the bank. Henry Chapman moved his barber shop to the building occupied by the post office.

Mrs. George Bird returned to her home at Safford Thursday.

We venture to say that more travelling men come to Columbiana than any place of its size in the State.

Tom Tinney left Monday for Gadsden where he has signed to pitch ball this season. Mr. W. E. Harrison is manager.

Miss Bettie Cleveland, Miss Elna Elliott and Miss Clarice White attended the Missionary Conference held in Talladega Wednesday.

$5,000,000 HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION WORK WILL AID UNEMPLOYED

that we may get these men at work as soon as possible," the captain said in commenting on future plans.

The first projects were advertised August 3. These have been given the necessary approval of the United States Bureau of roads. These plans call for the construction of 75 miles of roads and five bridges in widely scattered sections of the State.

One of the projects, calling for the paving of twenty miles of highway in Macon and Lee counties, will complete the Montgomery-Atlanta highway, while another 19 miles of grading and bridge construction in Dallas county will complete the Dixie Overland Highway. The Birmingham-Gadsden highway will be completed under this first unit with the construction of a bridge across the Warrior river and the paving of 14 miles of road in Jefferson County.

Highway delegations from all parts of the state have been visiting the capitol to urge projects in their own communities. Over a hundred appeared to ask that 183 miles of paving be done on Alabama route 1, commonly known as the Muscle Shoals-Mobile highway which traverses the length of the state from Tennessee to Florida. The delegates claimed that much of the annual tourist traffic to Florida would make use of this highway and that the cities and towns along the route would profit by it.

The projects follow:

Limestone County.—6.7 miles of paving, from Athens east toward Huntsville on the Lee Highway.

Walker County—3.4 miles of grading, paving and bridges through Jasper on the Bankhead Hihway.

Butler County—3 miles of paving from Chapman to Georgiana.

Macon and Lee Counties—20.2 miles of paving from two miles west of Tuskegee to Auburn, completing the Montgomery-Atlanta highway.

Etowah County—15 miles of paving from Attalla toward Collinsville on the Birmingham-Chattanooga highway.

Jefferson ounty—14 miles of paving from East Lake to Argo via Trusville, completing the Birmingham-Gadsden highway.

Dallas County—19 miles of grading and bridges with gravel surfacing from Selma to Brown's Station via Marion Junction, completin the only ungraded link of the Dixie Overland highway in Alabama.

Lowndes County—15 miles of paving from Davenport to Fort Deposit completing the Montgomery-Georgiana highhway.

Montgomery County—Eight tenths of a mile from Montgomery toward Troy.

Jefferson County—Construction of the Warrior River bridge on the Birmingham-Jasper highway.

Calhoun County—12 miles of paving from Oxford east to the Cleburne county line on the Bankhead Highway.

According to latest reports, applications for employment are being received in great numbers daily. The state contracts, when issued, will permit the contractors to employ a man but thirty hours a week with a minimum wage of twenty cents an hour. In this way more jobs will be created and the moderate wage scale will permit the state to build more roads for the same amount of expenditures thas it has been able to do in the past ten years.

ACTION IS DEMANDED!

We, The Undersigned Firms, Have Joined Hands In Shelby County

And Will March Shoulder To Shoulder For Alabama's Balanced Budget.

AS AN EMERGENCY MEASURE, WE URGE OUR GOVERNOR TO WIRE EACH PROBATE JUDGE TO HOLD IN ABEYANCE ALL ADVERTISED TAX SALES UNTIL HE CAN CALL A SPECIAL SESSION OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE. WE FEEL SURE THAT QUICK ACTION WILL BEGET CONFIDENCE, WHICH IS NEEDED NOW, NOT TOMORROW. WE FEEL LIKE THE HOME LOAN BANK WILL OFFER SUCCOR TO MANY DEPRESSED CITIZENS AND GREATLY STIMULATE MORALE. WE FEEL SURE THAT OUR REPRESENTATIVES, BOTH STATE AND NATIONAL, WILL MAKE THE PEOPLE FAMILIAR WITH THE PLAN AND TELL THEM HOW TRANSFERS CAN BE MADE AND LOANS SECURED.

CITIZENS

————PUBLIC CONFIDENCE MUST BE RESTORED————

BASICALLY, THE ONLY PLAN OR POLICY THAT WILL SUCCEED TODAY IS ONE THAT HELPS TO RESTORE PUBLIC CONFIDENCE.

PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IS WAVERING. BUSINESS IS UNCERTAIN. THE EDUCATIONAL SITUATION IS ACUTE.

WE EXPECT, AND WE HAVE A RIGHT TO EXPECT, THAT THE ADMINISTRATIVE AND LEGISLATIVE OFFICERS OF ALABAMA WILL DO THEIR DUTY AND RESTORE THE CONFIDENCE OF THE PEOPLE IN THEIR GOVERNMENT.

NOTHING WOULD HELP THE SITUATION SO MUCH AS A BALANCED BUDGET. THAT IS ESSENTIAL. OUR SCHOOLS MUST NOT CLOSE THEIR DOORS. OUR BUSINESS MUST NOT SUFFER AND OUR FINANCIAL STABILITY MUST NOT BE ENDANGERED. THE TIME FOR TALK AND PETTY POLITICS HAS PASSED. WE NEED ACTION. WE EXPECT ACTION. WE DEMAND ACTION.

WHEN YOU BEGIN TO BUY, THE WHEELS OF COMMERCE WILL START TURNING. THEN WHEN THE BANKS SEE THAT THE PUBLIC IS READY TO SPEND, THEY IN TURN WILL FEEL BETTER ABOUT SUPPLYING THE CREDIT WITH WHICH TO FINANCE THE BUSINESS AS IT IS CREATED.

————WITHOUT CONFIDENCE, COUNTY, STATE OR NATION CANNOT FUNCTION.————

WE ARE GOING TO DO OUR BIT AND HELP TO START THE WHEELS RUNNING—SO LET'S FORGET THERE HAS BEEN A DEPRESSION, WE PLEDGE YOU OUR COOPERATION AND WILL GREET YOU WITH A SMILE, AND BETTER BARGAINS THAN EVER. SOME TOWN, SOME COMMUNITY HAS TO "START THE BALL ROLLING"—WHY NOT MONTEVALLO, COUMBIANA, CALERA AND ALL OF SHELBY COUNTY?

OUR SLOGAN WILL BE BUSINESS IS TO BE HAD—MANY PEOPLE CAN AND WILL PAY THEIR BILLS—ALL WEST ALABAMA AND HER CROPS LOOK GOOD.

NOW THAT OUR GOVERNOR HAS CALLED A SPECIAL SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE, WE HOPE THAT STATE EXPENSES AND SALARIES WILL BE CUT, AND THE BUDGET BALANCED. WHEN OUR TEACHERS ARE PAID AND OUR INDEBTEDNESS IS WIPED OUT, WE WILL THEN SEE A VAST IMPROVEMENT. WHEN THIS IS DONE, ALABAMA'S DEPRESSION WILL BEGIN TO FADE, AND WHEN CHRISTMAS COMES WE WILL BE ABLE TO GIVE THANKS TO GOD FOR HIS GOODNESS AND THE LESSONS TAUGHT BY THE FAST DYING "OLD MAN DEPRESSION."

RAMBLING REMARKS

By
The Rambler

It seems funny but nevertheless it is true, a woman may be able to run her house alone but it is always necessary for her to have another woman to help her keep a secret.

o—o—o

Another mark of the depression is that more people are being killed on freight trains than are on the passenger lines.

o—o—o

The man who says that sweat and perspiration are the same thing most certainly does not known what he is talking about. You know the difference, don't you?

o—o—o

Maybe there is less suffering in the small towns for where is the small town merchant who can say "no" to the people that call him "Bill."

o—o—o

With Alabama getting started at once on the Highway Construction made possible by the Relief Bill we are sure the state will soon see prosperity, as we know it, return. Residents of Alabama and ex-service men are to have the preference in employment so far as it is possible.

Recently we ran across this poem and the author is unknown but we feel that all of our readers will be interested in its moral.

Yes, people will talk,
The saying is true,
They will talk about me,
They will talk about you.

If we go to the opera,
Someone will say
We should go to church
And learn how to pray.

If we go to church
And offer up prayers,
They say we are hypocrites
And putting on airs.

If we are rich
They call us a thief,
Scoff at our sorrows,
Laugh at our grief.

If we are poor
They say we shirk,
We are always lazy
And never would work.

They talk of our prospect,
They talk of our past,
And if we are happy
They say it can't last.

They talk of our loved ones
They talk of our foes,
They talk of our follies,
They talk of our woes.

They talk of our joys,
They talk of our fears,
They talk of our smiles,
They talk of our tears.

They talk if we are single,
They talk if we wed,
They talk of us living,
They talk of us dead.

Though we live like an angel,
With circumspect walk,
Our efforts are useless,
For people will talk.

SHELBY COUNTY PARENT TEACHER ASSOCIATIONS HOLD IMPORTANT MEET

Dr. O. C. Carmichael, Montevallo Gives Clear Discussion Of Local School Situation

A most important meeting of the Parent-Teacher Associations of Shelby County was held in the High School Auditorium in Columbiana, on Saturday morning, August 6, with Mrs. O. B. Cooper, President of the Montevallo Parent-Teachers Association in charge.

The principle speaker for the occasion was Dr. O. C. Carmichael, of Alabama College, who in a clear-cut address discussed most convincingly the school situation in Shelby County. Interested patrons were in sympathy with the critical condition and the following resolutions were unasimously adopted:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE PARENT TEACHER'S ASSOCIATIONS OF SHELBY COUNTY ON SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1932 AT COLUMBIANA, ALA.

WHEREAS, The people of Alabama, in cooperation with the Governor and State Legislature, have made notable improvements in their public schools within recent years by building more adequate school houses, by lengthening the school terms, by providing means of transportation, by improving the teaching personnel, and by equalizing the educational opportunities of its children, and

WHEREAS, the uncertain conditions now existing with reference to our schools for the coming year threatens to destroy all the advance made and cause Alabama to rank last in the matter of educating her children, therefore,

BE IT RESOLVED, That the parent teaches associations of Shelby County respectfully urge the Governor, with the aid of the legislature, during the session of the legislature which is to convene August 16, (1) to make some arrangement for the payment of past salaries of teachers, (2) to enact such laws as will be necessary to prevent the recurrence of conditions as now exist, and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, That the attention of those in authority be called to the 70,000 school children who will suffer if schools do not open creating a more serious problem of juvenile delinquency, and an increase of approximately 15,000 to the army of the unemployed of Alabama, and

BE IT RESOLVED, That a copy of the resolutions be sent to Governor B. M. Miller, Senator J. G. Duncan, Representative J. F. McGraw, The Shelby County Reporter, The Shelby County Democrat and a copy to the Birmingham Age-Herald.

These resolutions were offered by a resolution committee composed of: T. H. Kirby, Mrs. J. F. Hardy, J. F. Ballenger, Mrs. Frank Peterson, Mrs. C. E. Nivens, and were approved by the people who attended the meeting.

seated at the tables and grape punch was served. The entertainer for the evening was Miss Doris Barbour who sang many songs in a most engaging manner.

The scene next shifted to the home of Mr. and Mrs. P. O. Luck. Japanese lanterns and oriental decorations indicated that the youthful travellers had reached the Land of Flowers, and Orange pekoe tea was served by the geisha maids. Finishing this Japanese repast, cars rolled up and the signal "All Aboard For Dixieland met with a hurrah and Yamakita was the destination for an old-fashioned watermelon cutting proving the Southern hospitality the most enjoyable of all.

placed at the disposal of the Department of Education that the schools of the state would be unable to open this fall. And if by a stroke of good fortune they were able to open, that they would not be able to remain so for more than a month or two. Hundreds of school teachers in the state have not received any cash payment for their services during the past year. In recognition of this fact the governor has asked that the necessary funds be made available at once.

"The current debts of the State of Alabama are now approximately twenty million dollars ($20,000,000)," reads the proclamation, and "the state is going further into debt each month and will continue to do so until its budget is balanced because the appropriations exceed the income."

"Therefore, it is my opinion that an emergency exists requiring the action of the legislature of Alabama concerning the matters . . . specifically stated."

Following the formal call to the legislators the governor listed twenty-four subjects for consideration as follows:

To provide for the payment of the current debts . . . to submit a constitutional amendment for an income tax . . . ton enact an income tax law . . . to provide for the reduction of governmental expense by elimination of all possible offices and and reductions in salaries . . to balance the budget . . . to enact revenue producing measures . . . to provide for the taxing of capital stock of national banks.

To provide for road construction by appropriating funds to meet the federal aid amounts . . . for working convicts on the roads . . . to amend any laws giving any portion of the gasoline tax to counties . . . to allow any county or municipality to contribute its public funds for relief of unemployed . . . to regulate the operation of motor busses and trailers . . . to provide for refunding the bonds of the Alabama Bridge Corpn. . . . to provide for the payment of Alabama's current debts . . . to reduce appropriations . . . to reduce the expenses of county and municipal government combining offices and jobs.

To provide for the securing of full benefit of the emergency relief bill passed by the federal government. . . to repeal the seven amendments to the constitution which were to have been voted upon at the November elections . . . to repeal of an act permitting county officials to determine amount of official bonds . . . to provide for the study of the Brookings report . . . to amend the laws of pardons and paroles . . . to declare rights of stock holders in public utility corporations . . to appropriate money to defray expenses of the special session.

In order to tax the capital stock of national banks it will be necessary for the legislators to pass a statute repealing all exemptions of taxation of persons, companies or corporations engaged in the money lending enterprises. The Federal courts having passed down a decision that as long as there were exemptions from taxation that the national banks could not be taxed on their capital stock.

The counties in which the gasoline tax of five cents per gallon is received have been receiving forty per cent of the taxes for their own use in road construction. According to the proposal made by the governor the entire tax will not be taken by the state for use in state road construction.

The coming session of the legislature is occupying the thoughts of every citizen in the state who has been looking for state and federal aid for the unemployed. Educators and parents are anxiously awaiting some solution of the school problem. Although depressed with anxiety, citizens throughout the state look forward to the next few months with hope and confidence.

THE MISSING LINK IN RECOVERY

Every previous period of depression has been ended by conditions peculiar to the period. Some change, imperceptibly at work at the moment, nevertheless was bringing about a different order destined to restore prosperity on an even higher plane than that which had been lost. Whoso, in this or any other land today, can identify what the messianic agancy which will end the present depression is and will be and act upon his prescience, can establish a fortune beside which those of Rockefeller and Ford will seem small. Provided, of course, that the institution of private property continues to endure which likely it will throughout the time of all those now living.

Although the present one is the greatest of all depressions, that is because there are so many more people in the world for it to affect. Actually, earlier depressions were far deeper and wrought greater individual hardships. Today's standard of living, would have been considered high in antebellum days in '73 and '93. That, nearly all Americans agree, is beside the point. It betters no one today to realize how bad off others have been. The only sound comparison is with yesterday, not the day before yesterday.

Millions of persons still in active life have keen recollections of the last deep panic period, the great panic of '93. There was widespread unemployment and a bitterness among the populace which seemed so ominous as to herald the end of the republic. The political campaigns of today seem good fellowship rallies and love-your-neighbor drives compared with the sharp animosity which marked cleavage on such economic questions as the gold standard and such political expressions as populism. Brothers were divided and old friends parted more surely than by war. Brutality marked the treatment of all under dogs in the economic as well as the political picture.

Few could see that the nation was on the edge of the greatest period of expansion asd prosperity it ever had known, in fact that ever had been known by any nation. The rise of the corporations, many inventions, and the increased use of machinery soon worked a miracle and the nation became so busy it forgot its woes. There was so much work to be done.

The bankers panic of 1907 was less harsh. Its springs were not so deep and it was short-lived. A deranged banking and currency system seemed to be the weakest link in the economic chain of that time. This was soon strengthened and the nation forged ahead. It still was behind with its work.

Then came the incipient Wilson panic of 1913-14. Breadlines formed in the great cities and the smoke issued from few factory chimneys. Matters got so serious that it became necessary to invoke the machinery which had been invented as the result of the lesson of the Roosevelt panic of 1907. Millions in Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency were poured out in an effort to cure just such conditions as now obtain. There was hoarding and tight credit and money shortage to aggravate the unemployment.

Then came the European War. The world, taken collectively, was rich and warlike. America had gone farther with her machines than any other nation. Workmen were summoned quickly to stoke the fires of the factories and smoke, an outer penumbra of the smoke of battle, clouded the United States with a nimbus of prosperity shot with streaks of gold.

The credit of the nations was seemingly inexhausible. It should be remembered that, despite what any banker had said, it did prove inexhaustible to the very end. The nations still were borrowing and neither nation nor individual can borrow without credit.

After the Armistice, the tuned-up machinery continued to hum because so many people had war profits to spend. They looked into the pocket into which they had dumped their war profits but neglected to glance at the other pocket from which they had been paying war bills, neglected to see that that pocket was empty. So, with the hysterical and brief interruption of the depression of 1920-21, the post-war boom continued with wages and prices soaring ever higher and profits the most fabulous ever known.

Then the slump. Now a blank wall. No era of corporation organization calling for men to employ, no war, nothing but forbidding piles of goods which have been made in such oversupply that they cannot be sold because wages cannot be paid to workers to make more goods which cannot be sold because no wages have been paid with which people can buy what already has been made. And that other pocket empty. Both pockets now threatening final emptiness.

There seems nothing left to the various divisions of the people but to tax each other for their mutual benefit, and, as the wherewithal with which to pay taxes declines in volume, to insist upon raising the tax rate to make up the inevitable deficit.

PRESIDENT OF ALABAMA FARM BUREAU FAVORS INCOME TAX

Hon. J. L. Edwards Says That Tax Would Be Just And Equitable

Hon. J. L. Edwards, president of the Alabama Farm Bureau, strongly advocated an income tax as a remedy for existisg financial embarrassment of the state. This statement came in his report to the board of directors at the annual meeting of the state farm bureau federation.

"We have confronting us a great legislative problem, with our state government almost hopelessly in debt, our school teachers unpaid and our roads needing maintenance."

He then criticised those whose opposed the tax saying they had "prevented any constructive action" with an organized opposition to an income tax. He said the income tax would be "just and fair and equitable and would tap sources of revenue now escaping taxation, and would bring about a general and more equitable distribution of the expenses of the state".

WHAT A WHALE OF DIFFERENCE JUST A FEW YEARS MAKE

"I do not favor the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I stand for the efficient enforcement of the laws enacted thereunder. Our country has deliberately undertaken a great social and economic experiment, noble in motive and far-reaching in purpose. It must be worked out constructively."

—Acceptance speech of Herbert Hoover in 1928.

"It is my belief that in order to remedy present evils a change is necessary by which we resummon a proper share of initiative and responsibility which the very essence of our government demands shall rest upon the states and local authorities. That change must avoid the return of the saloon."

Acceptance speech of Herbert Hoover in 1932.

President Hoover is now officially aware that he has been renominated for the presidency by the Republican Party. He has been officially informed by an official committee and has officially accepted. This is part of the usual procedure in a presidential year and is always anticipated with interest because in his speech of acceptance the candidate lays the groundwork for his campaign.

The American public has been anxiously awaiting President Hoover's speech to see what he would say respecting prohibition. It was known that the Hoover influence was thrown against a straightout wet plank at the Chicago Republican Convention and that the President was very much on the fence.

Even in 1928 when all the signs pointed dry, Mr. Hoover was very cautious respecting the question and never did commit himself other than to say that prohibition was "a noble experiment." This, according to Republican stump speakers in dry states, meant that Hoover was dry, while in wet states hope was held out to the wets that Mr. Hoover did not take the "noble experiment" any too seriously.

In 1928, however, Mr. Hoover did say that he did not favor the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. He ran as a dry and was elected as a dry. Now Mr. Hoover is just as wet as Franklin D. Roosevelt but not as frank about it. Possibly a successful straddle in 1928 suggests the possibility of a successful straddle in 1932.

HOOVER AND ROOSEVELT

"It is my belief that in order to remedy present evils a change is necessary . . . That change must avoid the return of the saloon."

—Herbert Hoover.

"This convention wants repeal. Your candidate wants repeal. And I am confident that the United States of America wants repeal . . . We must rightly and morally prevent the return of the saloon."

—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

If Mr Hoover favors abolition of prohibition by the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment why does he not say so in as straightforward a manner as Mr. Roosevelt? Many will disagree with Roosevelt but none can question his honesty. He has come out for outright repeal while again Hoover attempts to straddle.

Hoover wants a "change" but what sort of a change? He wants to give the States their "proper share of initiative and responsibility", but what is their proper share? These are some of the questions the American voter has a right to expect Mr. Hoover to answer in a straightforward way. The voter asks the question, "Is Mr. Hoover wet or dry?" A simple answer would clear up the doubt, but a simple answer is not to be expected from Herbert Hoover.

TRANSITION

"I do not favor the repeal of the eighteenth amendment."

—Herbert Hoover (1928)

"The (Wickersham) commission by a large majority does not favor repeal of the eighteenth amendment as a cure for the inherent abuses of the liquor traffic. I am in accord with this view."

—Herbert Hoover (1930)

"It is my belief that in order to remedy present evils a change is necessary . . .

—Herbert Hoover (1932)

Undoubtedly when Mr. Hoover uttered the last statement quoted above he referred to a change being necessary in the handling of prohibition. It probably did not occur to him how the Democratic Party might use the statement.. . . . .

It might be a little unkind but not altogether inappropriate for the Democrats to say: "It is our belief that in order to remedy present evils a change from Herbert Hoover to Franklin D. Roosevelt is necessary."

COTTON PRICES SOAR TO NEW HIGH LEVEL FOR '32 DURING WEEK

Federal Government Report Sets Estimated Yield This Year At 11,306.000 Bales

ALABAMA CROP WILL BE APPROXIMATELY 950,000

October Contracts Gain 103 Points; Selling For 7.18, A Gain Of $5 Per Bale

The Government's estimate Monday of the current year's cotton crop placing the production nearly 6,000,000 less than in 1931, sent October contracts to the day's peak of 7.22 per pound.

Prices on the New Orleans exchange soared $5.00 per bale over Saturday's close, Monday, when the government's report indicating a yield of 11,306,000 bales proved about 1,000,000 under expectations.

Trading was the most active in months. Extremely heavy buying followed publication of the report. When the market resumed business following the customary suspension for the reception of the report, prices shot up 51 to 54 points above those preceeding the recess. At these levels prices were approximately $4.00 per bale over Saturday's close.

Buying continued active as the day wore on and after a slight recession of 2 to 6 points, the market bounded upward again after midsession, being helped by the strength in stocks. October contracts sold up to 7.19 and December to 7.33 or 101 to 103 points over Saturday's close, representing a net gain of over $5.00 per bale.

The first forecast of the season at 11,306.000 bales of 500 pounds gross weight, compares with 17,096,000 bales ginned last year.

Alabama's crop condition was placed at 59 per cent of normal with indicated production of 950,000 bales.

The forecast was based on the condition of the crop August 1, which was 65.6 per cent of a normal compared with 74.9 a year ago and 66.4, the ten year average.

BANDITS TAKE $400 FROM LEWIS LAWLEY ON SATURDAY NIGHT

Lewis Lovelady, Hillman Johnson And Reed Allen In Jail Pending Preliminary Investigation

Three masked bandits held up Lewis Lawley's store at Aldmont on the outskirts of Montevallo Saturday night about eight-thirty and made their getaway with over $400 in checks and cash.

The bandits drove up in a light roadster and under the ruse of buying cold drinks lured Mr. Lawley out of the store and covered him with guns. One entered the store and took the contents of the cash register. Mr. Lawley was ordered to stand in front of the store and was kept covered with guns as the bandits fled.

Lewis Lovelady, Hillman Johnson and Reed Allen of Spring Creek and Ebenezer are in the County jail pending preliminary trials. Deputies C. H. Fore and Bun White of the Sheriff's force made the arrests Monday night.

UNIQUE PLAN FOR RAISING CHURCH FUND IS SUCCESS

Members Of Methodist Church Class To Help Superannuates

The Young Matrons Class of the Methodist Church are sponsoring a Superanuated Preacher's fund. One of the unique ways they are raising their appropriation was typified on Friday afternoon when their friends were called on the telephone and asked to call for a C. O. D. package at the post office. There was a charge of twenty-five cents due on each parcel.

These packages were truly "bargains". Those fortunate enough to receive the message over Herr Bell's invention were richly rewarded for their trip to the post office. It is hoped that mail like this will arrive more frequently. The thought that prompted the movement is indeed a worthy one. The pride Which Mrs. Lightcap feels in her class seems justified in every respect.

RECENT INDICATIONS POINT TO IMPROVED BUSINESS IN STATE

Special Session of Legislature Expected To Bring Relief To Alabama

Business sentiment has improved in Alabama during the last thirty days. Like improvements have occurred in other states, as revealed in press reports, thereby indicating that the worst has been encountered and that better days are ahead.

Calling by Gov. Miller of a special session of the Legislature for August 16, has given much cheer, the feeling being that the Governor and his state legislature will adjust the State's finances to where debts will be paid, which will mean much to business.

Another important announcement act was that of asking for bids for construction of $1,750,000 worth of roads and bridges in Alabama, including 75 miles of grading and paving and five bridges. This will be part of the $5,000,000 highway construction unemployment relief program scheduled to be under way within the next few weeks with the aid of federal funds. Counties included in the initial lot of $1,750,000 are Limestone, Walker, Butler, Macon, Lee, Etowah, Jefferson, Dallas, Lowndes, Montgomery and Calhoun.

Gov. Miller announced that Alabama will apply for her full share of the $300,000,000 unemployment money authorized by Congress... Thad Holt of the Alabama Industrial Board, Birmingham, will serve as field representative of the emergency relief division handling this money.

A substantial rise in the value of securities and a corresponding increase of prices of farm products have contributed to the general improvement situation.

GOVERNOR APPEALS TO LEGISLATIVE BODIES FOR DRASTIC ACTION

Income Tax And $20,000,000 Bond Issue Principal Measures Championed By Miller

"IMPLICIT CONFIDENCE" IN LEGISLATURE SAYS MILLER

Recommends Placing Three Institutions Of Higher Learning Under One President Or Chancellor

An Income Levy, a $20,000,000 Bond Issue, and salary cuts for state employees were the primary recommendations emerging from the address of Governor B. M. Miller, delivered Tuesday before a joint meeting of the special session of Alabama lawmakers.

The address was delivered in the House of Representatives at the opening of a special session of the Legislature called by the Governor to balance the state's budget, reduce expenses, and enact new revenue legislation for operating the state government.

"This we must determine now," Governor Miller told the Legislature, "that the current debts of Alabama must be paid, that the schools must not close, that constructing and maintaining roads must continue, that federal road funds must be matched, that salaries and appropriations must be reduced, that useless offices and departments must be abolished, and that henceforth, we must live within our income."

"An income tax in Alabama, modeled after the federal income tax as to exemptions, and with graduated tax scale as existed in 1931, will, in a few years, pay all the current debts of Alabama, greatly assist in running our schools, and will gradually reduce in the future the ad valorem tax on real and personal property."

General Pershing Says "We Are at War"

In the stirring days of 1917-18 America had confidence in her commander in France, General John J. Pershing, and he fully demonstrated that he was worthy of that confidence.

General Pershing now says the nation is again at war in which the enemies allied against us are more insidious but not less dangerous, than those our troops faced n Europe. He says:

"Persuasive self-seeking and corruption, which the chosen officers of the law seem powerless to suppres; the sinister growth of the underworld, whose tentacles reach out to touch all of us; the ever increasing extravagance of government; and mysterious paralysis of our economic system—these are the enemies which now confront us."

What can America do to combat such enemies?

General Pershing, the man who planned our battles in France, who directed our campaigns, who led our troops to victory, has given his attention to this new war in which the nation is engaged. He has given careful consideration to the causes that have produced such a war, to the conditions that have given the present national enemies a temporary advantage, and with military precision he has planned a campaign for all American citizens in our struggle against our present day enemies—the gangster, the racketeer, the crooked politician.

We have secured newspaper publication rights on this important message from General Pershing, a message written by General Pershing. It is a valuable, an important, an intensely interesting document and will appear as two articles in these columns, the first one in next week's issue.

We could not offer our readers anything of greater importance or of greater interest. We want everyone to read these two articles and think and talk about General Pershing's plan of campaign.

FORMER SENATOR PREDICTS VICTORY FOR DEMOCRATS

Will Tour Western States In Interest Of Democratic Party

Former Senator Tom Heflin announced in Montgomery on August 8 that he would take the stump for the Democratic ticket this fall and speak in several western states. He predicted the election of Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt and John N. Garner by one of the largest majorities the party ever had in a presidential election.

Senator Heflin spent several minutes in the County jail conversing with John N. Lynch, former sheriff of Tallapoosa County, and sentenced recently by Federal Judge C. B. Kennamer to four months for contempt in connection with seed loan trials at Dothan. Heflin said that Lynch had been his warm friend for many years.

1,000 FARMERS ATTEND ANNUAL FARMERS WEEK MEETING AT AUBURN

Inspirational Speeches Feature Program On Campus of Alabama Polytechnic Institute

After spending three days, August 2, 3, and 4th, at their annual gathering in Auburn, 1,000 Alabama farm people returned to their homes with renewed appreciation of farm life, with practical information that will help them improve their operations and more inspiration to work together for their mutual welfare in behalf of co-operative business.

Addresses were delivered by the State's outstanding leaders in agriculture. Edward A. O'Neal, President of the American Farm Bureau Federation and former President of the Alabama Farm Bureau Federation, delivered a challenging, inspiring, and informative address concerning the major agricultural and economic problems of the nation.

Among the Alabama speakers were President Bradford Knapp, Director L. N. Duncan, Dean M. J. Funchess, Commissioner Seth P. Storrs, Dr. J. B. Hobdy, Dr. C. A. Cary, and J. L. Edwards.

Miss Mary Mimms, of the Louisana Extension Work, spoke on community organization, urging rural people to organize and operate community clubs for community work pertaining to economic, social, education, and other rural problems.

Mrs. J. D. Giles, retiring President of the Alabama Counsel of Home Demonstration Club Women, said in her annual report that farm women are more concerned about and more interested in business affairs, such as co-operation in buying and selling and taxation, and that they are studying and working on these problems in co-operation with their husbands.

J. Litt Edwards was re-elected President of the State Farm Bureau. E. S. Pace, from Eastaboga, was re-elected first Vice-President, and H. F. Koonce, Florence, was elected second Vice-President succeeding W. M. Hester, Russellville.

DEMOCRATIC LEADERS OVER ENTIRE NATION FORECAST LANDSLIDE

Governor Ely of Massachusetts Joins Roosevelt Ranks And Will Direct Fight In Bay State

NO INSURGENCY WITHIN SOLID SOUTH THIS YEAR

Roosevelt To Fire Opening Shot At Columbus, Ohio, Saturday With Address To Party Leaders

The last of the "Al" Smith leaders apparently was won over to the Roosevelt cause last week; the Smith men in the Middle West reported " all in line", and the opening of the Democratic nominee's own campaign was set for August 20, in Ohio.

Governor Ely of Massachusetts, who remained the only one of the "Happy Warrior's" chieftains not on record in favor of the New York governor, spent two and one-half hours in conference with Roosevelt in the executive mansion in Albany.

When the session was over, it was evident from the conferees' replies to queries that a harmonious agreement had been reached. It was understood that Ely would endorse Roosevelt in a statement Mosday and would lead the fight for the Democratic ticket in Massachusetts.

Meantime, Mayor Anton Cermak, of Chicago, declared on his arrival in New York that Roosevelt's quick espousal of the Democratic prohibition plank and his "master stroke" of flying to Chicago to deliver his ringing acceptance speech had won him the support of Smith followers throughout the middle west.

At Democratic headquarters it was announced Roosevelt would fire the opening gun of his campaign at the stadium in Columbus, Ohio at 4 p. m. on Saturday, August 20, before Democrats from all parts of the state. The gathering will be under the auspices of the Democratic State Committee.

When Ely, who placed Smith in nomination in Chicago, came from the much heralded "place meeting' with the party standard bearer, he was asked: "Will you support Roose-

GREATEST WORLD TASK IS TO PROMOTE WORK FOR THE UNEMPLOYED

All States And Counties Should Follow The Motto: "Build Better Roads Now"

At the San Francisco meeting of the National Editorial Association, a message was received from Alfred P. Sloan, Jr. President of the General Motors Corporation, which stated that the greatest single task confronting the world today was to find productive employment for those who are out of work. To do so, according to the news story in a San Francisco daily, it is necessary "to take things as they are, not as they should be; to analyze economic facts based action upon them, and dispel the general lack of confidence."

In every community there exists at least one opportunity to construct or improve some essential public service. Removing the menaces which are responsible for much of the loss of life by building greater safety into highways, could well be considered. Widening roadways, eliminating dangerous curves, alleviating accidents on loose gravel and dirt roads due to skidding flying stones and dust are mong the most necessary objectives.

"The need was never so great, the opportunity never so plainly presented, "asserts Dan B. Miller, Managing Engineer, Pacific Coast Div. of the Asphalt Institute. "Men and equipment are available at unheard of prices and materials were never so cheap. Take, for instance, the materials which are required to build the type of surfacings used by state highway departments on intermediate traffic roads; crushed rock and gravel can be bought for approvimately half their usual cost; asphalts and and road oils are the lowest in years".

Gypsies to Go Modern, Says New King

Discard of the colorful costumes which have so long distinguished their nomadic race, and entrance into legitimate trades as good American citizens, is the aim of Steve Stanley of Detroit, whose recent coronation as king of the gypsies ended a struggle for the throne that threatened to split the ancient race. King Stanley's unprecedented preachings met with considerable opposition, but his successful coronation would seem to indicate that the American gypsy tribes will soon cease their wanderings and settle down to the more prosaic life of their adopted country, with just an occasional trip on the road. King Stanley, who is a graduate of the New York City college, is shown above with two of his sisters who illustrate the new and the old in gypsy costume.

SCIENCE WILL SEEK COCOS ISLAND GOLD

New Metal Detector to Be Tried by Expedition.

Washington.—The elusive caches of pirate gold on Cocos island that have defied maps and diggings of fortune hunters for more than a century, now must dodge the delicate instruments of science. An expedition now on the island is reported pinning its hopes on a newly developed metal detector.

"Cocos island, which is 16 square miles of lofty, forest-covered mountains and furrowed valleys, owes its fame to the activities of pirates along the coasts of Central and South America from the Seventeenth to the early part of the last century," says a bulletin from the National Geographic society.

"After Capt. Edward Davis looted Leon, Nicaragua, in 1685, he sailed for Cocos, buried his treasure and rested until his next plundering expedition. In the early eighties, Benito, a former Portuguese naval officer who was a scourge to shipping in the Caribbean, felt that his old bailiwick was becoming too well policed for his profession, rounded the Horn, preyed upon towns and shipping along the Pacific coast and sought refuge on Cocos. He also buried treasure on the island before he and his crew were captured.

Loot of Lima Magnet.

"Loots of other pirates have been reported buried on Cocos, but the famous loot of Lima, perhaps, is the chief magnet of modern expeditions to the island. Gold and silver and precious stones worth millions that were accumulated by the Spaniards from the natives and from richly adorned Inca temples, were hoarded in Lima when a revolution broke.

"The Lima mint was filled with gold and silver and the Lima cathedral was a vault of wealth. The cathedral chalices were solid gold, studded with priceless gems. Golden altars equipment glistened in the dim light of the edifice. Diamond-studded vestments beamed with a new radiance with every movement of the priests who wore them. There were chasubles of gold adorned with rows of diamonds, rubies, emeralds and sapphires.

"Fearing seizure of these treasures by the revolutionists, Lima city fathers sought a ship as a hiding place. The Mary Dear was riding at anchor in the harbor of Callao. Under cover of darkness the treasures were transferred to the Mary Dear's hold and a guard stationed abroad. Probably unknown to the Spaniards, the Mary Dear was commanded by one of Benito's pirates. The glint of gold and the shimmer of jewels crazed the captain. The guards were massacred and thrown overboard, and the Mary Dear made for the open sea. The crew of the ship was arrested later but not until the cargo of riches had been buried, presumably on Cocos.

Sought by Many.

"In the last century more than a score of expeditions have visited Cocos. One was headed by the famous British racer, Sir Malcolm Campbell. Another was led by the widow of a friend of the Mary Dear's captain, while a third was led by two women philanthropists. A British naval officer anchored at Cocos and ordered his crew to find the treasure, but all he gained was a severe reprimand from the British admiralty when he reached England.

'Coconuts (from which the island gets its name) and bananas grow wild. Wild pigs scamper through the forests, myriad birds swarm its trees, fish abound in surrounding waters, coffee, sugar and vegetables can be grown in its fertile spots, fresh water is plentiful and its naturally tropical atmosphere is tempered by sea breezes and frequent rains. Yet Cocos has never been successfully colonized. However, the arid Galapagos islands, its neighbors 380 miles to the southwest, are permanently inhabited.

"For a short time Costa Rica maintained a penal colony on Cocos island and besides pirates, it was visited from time to time by whalers. One treasure hunter remained on Cocos for several years in an unsuccessful attempt to colonize it."

Marriages in Nevada as Well as Divorces Boom

Reno, Nev.—One reason why Nevada's marriage business is booming as a rival to divorces, insofar as moneymaking is concerned, is that a license issued in any of the 17 counties may be used in any part of the state. This is an aid to those desiring secrecy, as a license may be secured in some tiny hamlet which is a county seat and used in Reno.

U. S. BIRTH RATE REACHES LOWEST POINT IN YEARS

But Fewer Babies Die During First Year.

Washington.—The birth rate in the United States dropped during 1931 to the lowest point it has reached since the establishment of birth registration in this country nearly 17 years ago, according to statistics made public by the bureau of the census.

At the same time, the bureau reported, the infant mortality rate showed a continued decline in the year, dropping to its lowest level since such statistics have been systematically compiled. During the year the infant death rate was 61.7 for every 1,000 live births, as compared with a rate of 64.7 in 1930.

The birth rate for the country in 1931 was 17.8 for every 1,000 of population, according to the bureau's report. In 1930 the rate was 18.9. The 1931 birth rate in Illinois was 15.4, compared with 16.7 in 1930.

The total number of children born in this country during last year was 2,084,443, as compared with 2,191,012 in the preceding year.

Of the more than 2,000,000 born in 1931, 126,645 died in their first years of life, while in 1930 the number reached 141,670.

The registration area on which the bureau's report was based includes all except two states and comprises 94.7 per cent of the total population of the country.

In the rural part of this registration area the birth rate and infant mortality rates were higher than in the urban section, the report showed, while the still birth rate was lower. The rural section had a population of 59,338,000, while the urban section had a population of 57,560,000.

In the city area the birth rate was 17.5 per 1,000 of population; the infant mortality rate was 60.8 per 1,000 births, and the still birth rate was 4 for every 100 live births.

In the rural area the birth rate was 18.2; the infant mortality rate 62.6; and the still birth rate 3.7.

POTPOURRI

Camphor

Camphor is obtained by distilling wood chips and bark of a tree of the laurel species grown most extensively in Japan and surrounding islands. After it has been freed of volatile oil and refined, it is very valuable as a medicine. It is also used in the manufacture of celluloid and some explosives.

BEING LAUGHED AT

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Late Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

It is Goldsmith, or at least I think it is, who speaks of the frightened boy going home through black woods at night—"Whistling aloud to keep his courage up."

Bluster is generally an outgrowth of fear. It is a camouflage to conceal a man's real feelings. Cynicism and insolence are more often than otherwise the disguise of self-consciousness and sensitiveness.

I think, very likely the main reason for this is that we want to simulate virtues or characteristics which we do not have, and are afraid of being laughed at if our friends discover our lack. And if there is one thing more than another which youth cannot meet or endure it is laughter.

"The fellows would laugh at me," clinches any argument in favor of granting a youthful request.

When Joice was editor of our college paper he ridiculed everything that was being done for the control of student conduct and advocated all sorts of revolts and irregularities.

I had thought I knew him pretty well during his first years in college, and he had struck me as a shy sensitive boy with high ideals and a distinct sense of honor. He dropped into the office one day, and we got onto his principles as presented in the daily.

"I can't believe that you actually think the things you are writing," I said to him. "If you do you are an entirely different fellow from what you were last year and before. What's the cause of it all?"

He hesitated a moment.

"I'm awfully sensitive," he explained, "and the thing that I cannot bear is the thought that if I stand for things that are conventional and right, people may laugh at me and call me a mollycoddle. I can't stand ridicule."

"What are you going to do when you get out of college?" I inquired.

"I'm going to be a lawyer."

I laughed. "Well, you'd better get used to being laughed at early in life," I said, "or some day they'll laugh you out of court."

Dressed for Dinner

By JANE OSBORN

© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate. (WNU Service)

WREN BALDWIN felt a species of self-consciousness as he strode into the boarding house dining room that second night of his residence there, dressed in his tuxedo. He assured himself that there was nothing out of the way in his appearance. No one, of course, would know that the reason he was thus formally dressed was because he had but one business suit at present in which, after he had returned from the office a quarter of an hour ago, he had discovered a ripped seam that had made it quite necessary to take it to the tailor for repairs.

The ten boarders at Mrs. Haven's sat at one long table, and to hide any slight embarrassment Wren began to talk of the weather to the prim little old lady who sat next to him.

As he was talking he noticed that Miss Ames cast preoccupied glances across the table and when she could politely turn her attention from him she looked brightly across and said: "Goin' out tonight, Miss Drew?"

"Why, no, Miss Ames," said the girl addressed as Miss Drew. "What made you ask that?"

"Then you are expecting company," announced Miss Ames with the familiarity that she seemed to think living under the same boarding-house roof permitted. Wren Baldwin eating the watery soup before him felt a surprising twang of jealousy. He had noticed this girl—Miss Drew as they called her—that morning in her trim dark business frock and noticed too the lovely gray eyes shaded with dark long lashes.

After dinner the boarders adjourned to the boarding-house parlor and lingered there if for no other reason than to postpone the time of going to their insufficiently heated rooms.

"I suppose you're going out," said the old woman.

"Oh, to be sure," said Wren, remembering the suit at the tailor's and wondering somehow whether Miss Ames knew of his errand there. "I do have to go out for a few minutes later on."

Then a pleasant man of sixty named Brown approached Wren.

"If you weren't going out I'd ask you to make up a table of bridge," he said. "There'd be my wife and I and Miss Drew if we could get a fourth. It's too chilly to go up yet,"

"I'll play," said Wren, and then, "only I imagine Miss Drew will have another partner presently."

But apparently Miss Drew had no other partner. The table was opened, Mrs. Brown went upstairs for the cards and the four sat down with Miss Ames constituting an uninvited audience with her chair drawn up between that of Wren and Miss Drew.

So they played, and as they played and no caller arrived for Miss Drew, Wren's jealousy abated, and as it abated his admiration for her increased. All at once he looked at the clock and saw that the hands pointed to half-past nine. He happened to be playing dummy at the time, so without much ceremony about it he rose and made some excuse about having to go out for a few minutes. Then seizing his coat and hat in the hall he hurried around the corner to the tailor shop, the terrifying thought that it might any minute close for the night quickening his steps. Back in the boarding house hall he tucked his suit under his coat and hastened to his room, then back to the card table.

"Did you get what you went after?" asked Miss Ames, and Wren with all the nonchalance he could command said that he did. Then when it was eleven and time to go to bed, Mrs. Brown said that it had been a very nice party, and a very dressed-up party, too, she added significantly. Mr. Brown took his wife's arm on one side and Miss Ames on the other and started for the stairs. "We old folks will go along and let you youngsters put up the table," he said, almost dragging the unwilling Miss Ames with him.

Then over the table Wren felt that he ought to make an explanation—perhaps a complete confession to begin with would be best.

"So that's why I had to hurry out at half-past nine," he finished his explantation. "I would have explained then only that little Miss Ames was so anxious to know—"

Miss Drew laughed delightfully. She explained, too. "I'm terribly poor myself," she said, "but before we lost everything I did dress for dinner and my first position was as a resident social secretary where I was expected to dress. Now I am working in an office, but it seemed so dingy here and I just made up my mind that I'd feel a lot more cheerful if I dressed—as long as I have the old evening dress on hand." Their hands met as they were folding the card table cover and for a few seconds Wren held the girl's in his.

"Please dress again tomorrow night," said Miss Drew. "Just so Miss Ames won't suspect you had a special reason."

"I'll dress for dinner every night," said Wren, "if you want me to. It will give the boarders something to talk about."

But before many months had passed the boarders had more than that to talk about. Wren and Miss Drew were married and went to live in an inexpensive little apartment a few blocks away—where they didn't dress for dinner.

League Breaking Up
Why Gen. Wood Travels
Will Rogers' Ranch
Little Farming Profit

The important world news, yet to have official confirmation, announces the retirement of Germany, Italy and Japan from the League of Nations. That would leave in the league only two great nations of Europe: England and France.

This is not our affair, for we are blessedly out and shall never be pushed into the league.

But with the three nations out of the "Big Five," the league will feel like a centipede minus seventy-two legs.

Europe will find itself preparing for war, as in 1914, with no central gathering place, even for talking about peace.

Japan feels that the league interferes in exclusively Asiatic matters. Germany feels that she has been badly treated.

Italy resents too much advice, and being classed as a child, mentally, by the two big nations that really are the league. If Japan, Italy and Germany get out, that will begin a new European chapter.

Add to the list of important and intelligent people now in California Gen. Robert E. Wood, now traveling through this western country by airplane. General Wood, a West Pointer, was for several years in charge of government work on the Panama canal. Now he is president of Sears-Roebuck and has been visiting his distributing departments and retail stores throughout the West. His answer to the question, "Are you studying and correcting mistaken methods in your branch offices?" should interest business men. "No," said he, "I am not looking for weakness in our branches. I am finding out by visiting these branches what is the matter with us at headquarters. If any part of a man's body doesn't work well, you know something is wrong in his head. If branches in a big organization don't work well, that shows something wrong, not with the branches, but with headquarters. By visiting our branches I find what is the matter with my own methods and with headquarters generally."

Will Rogers' career reminds you that we waste sympathy on the poor red men, supposed to have been deprived of his lands, his horses and his position in America. Two Americans, well known, are descended from "Poor Lo." One, Mr. Curtis, is Vice President of the United States. The other, Will Rogers, has avenged his Indian ancestors by getting together fifty of the finest horses—hunters and polo ponies —in this country, also untold areas of the most valuable real estate in America. He would not care to have you say how many millions that real estate is worth.

Mr. Rogers always has some one thing that interests him violently. Just now it is the fact that two Irishmen in the Olympics, Dr. Pat O'Callaghan and Robert Tisdale, have, by their prowess, won more honor and glory in the games than all the rest of the British empire put together.

This writing follows a swift return trip to the writer's alfalfa ranch at Hodge on the Mojave desert, 124 miles to the east and 2,000 feet up in the air. Farmers may be comforted by news that the finest quality of baled alfalfa hay, with blue flowers still in the hay and not a weed in a carload, sells f. o. b. Hodge for $8 per ton. Under irrigation 1,000,000 pounds of water are required to grow a ton of alfalfa and much electricity to pump the water, so that alfalfa growing just now is profitable for everybody but the grower.

General conditions and the fact that Los Angeles dairymen have been having a "milk war," cutting the price to three cents a quart, have not improved the farmers' lot.

You can buy good hay, a little coarser, in the Imperial valley for $5 a ton. Trucks and trailers that haul the hay run day and night, two men on each truck; one sleeps while the other drives. Both work, loading and unloading. One man remarked cheerfully that he had not had his shoes off in ten days. Men work for a living in these times; many would be glad to work for their board, here as in many other states.

Coming west, passing the biggest pea-canning factory in the world, just east of Ogden, in Utah, you learn that ordinary workers, formerly paid 60 and 70 cents an hour, now get 18 cents an hour, $1.80 for a ten-hour day. Skilled mechanics get 22 cents an hour.

Wild animals that depend on nobody to hire them are fortunate. On the fine concrete road east of Victorville you disturb a buzzard, peacefully eating the remains of a rabbit crushed by an automobile. The bird flies up as you pass, then drops and resumes his repast. The automobile to him is a blessing. Its lights fascinate the rabbits, they do not move and the automobile kills them. Lights of big cities have something of the same effect on young men, but operate more slowly.

Says WILL ROGERS

LOS ANGELES.—Well with the Olympic Games come and gone for another four years I dont know how this woman thing doing all these games is. I mean I cant just get my mind made up about it, but I guess its all right. They just as well be doing that as in some other devilment. It sure does make em take care of their health. Course some say that it will be bad for em in the long run, but I doubt it. You know women always could endure more than men. (Not only physically, but mentally. Did you ever get a peek at some of the husbands?) But they can just stand more pain, there is just lots of things where they are superior to the so called male.

So I reckon that its only a matter of time that they will not only be doing the same games as the men but will be in the same classes. There will be no male and female classes, for the men are getting pretty punk as a race. We will be wearing skirts in another generation. I want to pass out just before they catch me doing some "battick" work. You know there was some awful sad things out here in these Olympics even before they started. Take for instance the trials. I saw the track and field trials for the American team at Palo Alto, and the dissapointment of the ones that were beat for places. Its not so bad to beat in the Olympics, that means you were the best in your country anyhow, but when you have built up a great reputation around your own home, college, and state, and your records show that your time, or the heighth of your jump is above certain other performers, then to train for months, even years, to make this Olympic games that are held at home, then you deny yourself, train conscientiously, and then get to the trials and be beaten, maybe by inches, and in lots of cases by men who your previous record showed was better than the time they beat you in, in other words, you know that you just happened to have an off day that particular day. There is no doubt that there is men on the American team that beat men that day that they couldent do it again in a lifetime. Well you take a loser like that, and darn it it hurts. If you absolutely knew in your own heart that you could beat the man that beat you, why that would sit pretty tough with you wouldent it?

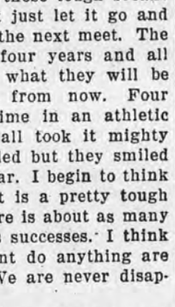
Course thats not taking any credit from the men and women that won, but its just one of those tough breaks of fate. They cant just let it go and make up for it at the next meet. The next Olympics is four years and all of em dont know what they will be doing four years from now. Four years is a long time in an athletic career. But they all took it mighty gamely. They smiled but they smiled through many a tear. I begin to think this athletic racket is a pretty tough thing at that. There is about as many disappointments as successes. I think us fellows that cant do anything are just as well off. We are never disappointed.

Wait till we get to golf, bridge, or cocktail shaking, then the American white man will come into his own. Everybody out here is predicting this California record breaking to continue right up till after November fourth, when Roosevelt will outrun Hovoer, Tolan, Metcalf, and maybe Babe Didrickson.

In the bicycle events out here in the Olympics, our riders couldent get there in time to change a tire for the foreigners. Too many cars parked outside our school houses for our young folks to even know how to ride a bike.

Folks had nothing laid up when this depression hit us, but it looks like they think autographs will save em the next time.

Its awful hard to get your mind on such insignificant things as republicans, or democrat candidates, with fifteen hundred picked athletes of the world breaking records under your nose. If an athlete wins an event and dont break a worlds record, we hiss him out of the arena.



Incidentally the man that brought the first "slaves" to this country must have had these Olympic games in mind, for these "senagambians" have just about run the white man ragged. Every winner is either an American negro, or an American white woman.

Every year it gets harder and harder to tell the difference between a republican and a democrat. (Course outside of the looks) their platforms and policies become more and more alike. But I believe I have found out the sure way to tell one from another this year. Its just the way they talk. The republicans says, "Well things could have been worse" and the democrats says, "How?"

Why pay good money for any second-choice tire when FIRST-CHOICE costs no more?

YOU don't have to take anybody's word for the fact that this tire's low priced. Here's what it costs, in big, black type.

You don't have to take anybody's word for the quality these prices buy. Look at the tire. It's a genuine Goodyear. Built in the world's largest tire factories. Guaranteed for life. Full oversize. Bodied with Goodyear Supertwist Cord. Goodyear Speedway by name.

You bet this is a bargain. Goodyear never built a better tire at such prices as these—and millions of motorists know, Goodyear builds the best tires on the road.

Why buy any second-choice tire when FIRST-CHOICE sells at the same low price?

Fertile Top Soil Saved by Terrace

The erosion problem, one of the most serious facing the farms of the United States, has been practically solved in one section of Missouri where the federal warnings have been taken seriously. In this area steep hillsides, which for years had been washed by heavy rains, have been planted in corn by the so-called terracing method. The results have more than borne out the contentions of the experts who have maintained that this method is the only one which will save the fertile top soil which in unprotected regions has been washed away either by sheet erosion or by gullying.

To illustrate, accurate measurements on adjacent fields subject to the same rainfall as the terraced fields disclosed the soil washed away last year at the rate of 140 tons per acre. On the terraced fields the loss showed an average of 2.3 tons per acre with one particular development with just 85 pounds over a ton loss.

There are two methods of terracing, one which provides a gentle slope from one flat down towards the terrace leading to the flat on the next lower level, and one in which the various flats are made as level as possible. In the case of the level areas, the loss was held to the minimum.

The amount of soil lost annually through the erosion is tremendous and experts are endeavoring to bring all farmers with fields subject to the swift wash of heavy rainfall to a realization of the danger to their future prosperity in the continued ignoring of the steady drain on their capital involved in the loss of top soil.

Sod House Construction

A sod house is to be built in Topeka for tourists by the State Historical society. The sod house, which was the only habitation of settlers of western Kansas, should not be confused with the dugout. The sod house was built of great layers of sod and some that were built by the pioneers are still doing duty. Oldtimers say the virtue of the sod house was its coolness in summer. If well constructed it was impervious to rain.

THE "ENGINEER" SPEAKS

The audience cheered long and loud to the words of the "Great Engineer" last week when he delivered his formal acceptance speech before a large body of republicans in Washington. Radios all over the nation were vibrated by the cheers of what we believe to be speudo-enthusiasm. In fact, we were reminded of the custom in some countries of hiring mourners to follow the body of the deceased whose reputation is too shady to merit real bereavement. Mourning might have truly been appropriate on that night, but it was in the order of things that those gathered to hear the acceptance speech THRILL at its contents so that the thousands of radio listeners might become deeply impressed with Mr. Hoover's TRIUMPH.

It was the same Hoover whose career is replete with instances of success brought about, not merely by the honest merits of the man, but by virtue of a unique subtlety of character seldom found, and which lent power to his efforts. Yes, it was the same Hoover who rose from a mine manager in Australia to the presidency of the United States, by way of a very checkered and shady route.

But in these times voters do not lay consequence to the fact that a man has committed deeds of questionable nature. It is not to them, a fact of regret that they have elected to the presidency a man who through greed and inhumaneness practically brought about the enslavement of Australian mine workers, and the poverty of middle-class English investors. If he could have done these things, how can he expect the support and plaudits of the American people?

But Herbert C. Hoover was not to be denied success. He realized early in life that a rigid code of ethics wouldn't be very conducive to the realization of his ambitions. He did not stop to question whether it was right or wrong to steal valuable mines from the Chinese government. All he could see or think of was his personal agrandisement.

And so the voters of this country might do well to realize that the Herbert Hoover who seeks re-election in November is the same individual, who will again place the interests of the people secondary to his own selfish ones. They should realize that the United States numbers among its outstanding men, many honest and upright aspirants who would render more honest service to the country than the fence-jumping Herbert Hoover.

the Governor's message:

"In unity there is strength. There is a great financial crisis in Alabama. We must meet it. In you we have implicit confdence. You have the good of the state at heart. Your every mpulse is to give relief. Cooperate with you I will. We must face the facts and not fancy screens. The current debts of the state have reached and passed beyond the $20,000,000 mark.

"The financial condition of many citizens of the state makes it right, in my opinion for the salaries of all public officials and employees, state, county and municipal, to be reduced.

"I recommend in the interest of economy, that the court of appeals be abolished at the termination of the present term of the judges of this court.

"We have three higher institutions of learning (Alabama, Auburn and Woman's College at Montevallo. We have three presidents —total salaries $34,000 annually. There should be one president or chancellor for the three institutions.

"Those who use the roads should pay for them. The gas and motor vehicles used on them should be taxed to pay the costs.

"I believe that every appropriation which has been made for any purpose should be repealed, effective September 30, and an entirely new appropriation bill to begin October 1 should be adopted. Many appropriations must be reduced."

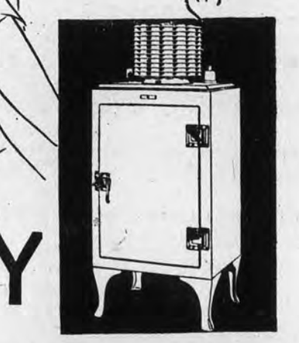
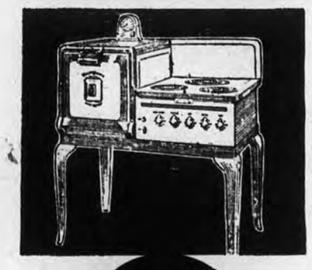
WHAT ELECTRICITY HAS DONE FOR ALABAMA

Low Cost
ELECTRICITY
Has Done Away With Drudgery In Many Alabama Homes





Low cost, statewide electric power service has revolutionized housekeeping here in Alabama. It has placed at the command of Alabama women scores of tireless servants such as those pictured here . . . electric ranges that cook without attention . . . electric refrigerators that keep food fresh and safe . . . vacuum cleaners that whisk away dirt . . . automatic water service that is always instantly available. These and other labor saving appliances have made housekeeping a joy instead of burden. They have made homemakers out of housekeepers.

"Some day," said Osage, over its afternoon paper, "somebody is going to come along and shoot old Cimarron."

"I should think his wife would save them the trouble," some one suggested.

If Yancey's sporadic contributions increased the paper's circulation it was Sabra's steady drive that maintained it. It was a gigantic task to keep up with the changes that were sweeping over Osage and all of Oklahoma. Yet the columns of the Wigwam recorded these changes in its news columns, in its editorial pages, in its personal and local items and its advertisements, as faithfully as on the day of its first issue when Yancey had told them who killed Pegler. Perhaps it was because Sabra, even during Yancey's many absences, felt that the paper must be prepared any day to meet his scathing eye.

Strange items began to appear daily in the paper's columns—strange to the eye not interested in oil; but there was no such eye in Oklahoma, nor, for that matter, in the whole Southwest. Cryptic though these items might be to dwellers in other parts of the United States, they were of more absorbing interest to Oklahomans than front-page stories of war, romance, intrigue, royalty, crime.

"Indian Territory Illuminating Oil company swabbed 42 barrels in its No. 8 Lizzie in the northwest corner of the southwest of the northwest of 11-8-6 after having plugged back to 4,268 feet, and shooting with 52 quarts.

"The wildcat test of McComb two miles north of Kewoka which is No. 1 Sutton in the southwest corner of the southeast of the northeast of 35-2-9 was given a shot of 105 quarts in the sand from 1,867 feet and hole bridged. As it stands it is estimated good for 450 barrels daily."

The paper's ads reflected the change. The old livery stable, with its buggies and phaetons, its plugs to be hired, its tobacco-chewing loungers, its odor of straw, manure, and axle grease, was swept away, and in its place was Fink's Garage and Auto Livery. Repairs of All Kinds. Buy a Stimson Salient Six. The smell of gasoline, the hiss of the hose, lean young lads with grease-grimed fingers, engine wise.

Come to the Chamber of Commerce Dinner. The Oklahoma City College and Glee Club will sing.

Osage began to travel, to see the world. Their wanderings were no longer local. Where, two years ago, you read that Dr. and Mrs. Horace McGill are up from Concho to do their Christmas buying, you now saw that Mr. and Mrs. W. Fletcher Busby have left for a trip to Europe, Egypt, and the Holy land. You knew that old Wick Busby had made his pile in oil and that Nettie Busby was out to see the world.

Most astounding of all were the Indian items, for now the Oklahoma Wigwam and every other paper in the country regularly ran news about those incredible people who in one short year had leaped from the Neolithic age to Broadway.

The Osage Indians, a little more than two thousand in number, who but yesterday were a ragged, half-fed and listless band, squatting wretchedly on the reservation allotted them, waiting until time, sickness, and misery should blot them forever from the land, were now, by a miracle of nature, the richest nation in the world. The barren ground on which they had lived now yielded the most lavish oil flow in the state. Yancey Cravat's news story and editorial had been copied and read all over the country. A stunned government tried to bring order out of chaos of riches. The two thousand Osages were swept off the reservation to make way for the flood of oil that was transmuted into a flood of gold. They were transported to a new section called Wazhazhe, which is the ancient Indian word for Osage.

Agents appointed. Offices established. Millions of barrels of oil. Millions of dollars. Millions of dollars yearly to be divided somehow among two thousand Osage Indians, to whom a blanket, a bowl of soffica, a mangy pony, a bit of tobacco, a disk of peyote had meant riches. And now every full blood, half blood, or quarter blood Osage was put on the Indian roll, and every name on the Indian roll was entitled to a head right. Every head right meant a definite share in the millions. Five in a family—five head rights. Ten in a family—ten head rights. The Indian agent's office was full of typewriters, files, pads, ledgers, neat young clerks all occupied with papers and documents that read like some fantastic nightmare. The white man's eye, traveling down the tidy list, with its story-book Indian names and its hard, cold, matter-of-fact figures, rejected what it read as being too absurd for the mind to grasp.

Clint Tall Meat, $523,000.
Benny Warrior, $192,000.
Ho ki ah se, $265,887.
Long Foot Magpie, $387,942.

The government bought them farms with their own oil money, and built big red brick houses near the roadside and furnished them in plush and pianos and linoleum and gas ranges and phonographs. You saw their powerful motor cars, dust covered, whirling up and down the red clay Oklahoma roads—those roads still rutted, unpaved, hazardous, for Oklahoma had had no time to attend to such matters. Fifty years before, whole bands of Osages on their wiry little ponies had traveled south in the winter and north in the summer to visit their Indian cousins. Later, huddled miserably on their reservation, they had issued forth on foot or in wretched wagons to pay their seasonal visits and to try to recapture, by talk and song and dance and ritual, some pale ghost of their departed happiness. A shabby enough procession, guarded, furtive, smoldering.

But now you saw each Osage buck in his high-powered car, his inexpert hands grasping the wheel, his enormous sombrero—larger even than the white man's hat—flapping in the breeze that he made by his speed. In the back you saw the brilliance of feathers and blankets worn by the beady-eyed children and the great placid squaw crouched in the bottom of the car. The white man driving the same road gave these Indian cars a wide berth, for he knew they stopped for no one, kept the middle of the road, flew over bridges, draws, and ditches like mad things.

Grudgingly, for she still despised them, Sabra Cravat devoted a page of the Wigwam to news of the Osages, those moneyed, petted wards of a bewildered government. The page appeared under the title of Indian News, and its contents were more than tinged with the grotesque.

The Osages were Wigwam subscribers. They read the paper, or had it read to them if they were of the older and less literate generation. Sabra was accustomed to seeing the doorway suddenly darkened by a huge blanketed form or to look up, startled, to behold the brilliant striped figure standing beside her desk in the business office. If Yancey chanced to be in the occasion became very social.

"How!"

"How!"

"Want um paper."

"All right, Short Tooth. Five dollars."

The blanketed figure would produce a wallet whose cheeks were plump to bursting with round silver dollars, for the Osage loved the sound and feel of the bright metal disks. Down on the desk they clinked.

The huge Osage stood then, waiting. Yancey knew what was wanted, as did Sabra.

"Me want see iron man. Make um name."

Whereupon Yancey or Sabra would conduct the visitor into the composing room. There were three linotype machines now, clanking and chattering away. Once Yancey had taken old Big Elk, Ruby's father, back there to see how the linotype turned liquid lead into printed words. He had had Jesse Rickey, at the linotype's keyboard, turn out old Big Elk's name in the form of a neat metal bar, together with the paper slip of its imprint.

There was no stopping it. The story of the iron monster that could talk and write and move spread like a prairie fire through Wazhazhe. Whole families subscribed separately for the Oklahoma Wigwam—bucks, squaws, girls, boys, papooses in arms. The iron monster had for them a fascination that was a mingling of admiration, awe, and fear. It was useless to explain that they need not take out a subscription in order to own one of these coveted metal bars. It had been done once. They always would do it that way. Sabra, if she happened to be in charge, always gave the five dollars to her pet charity, after trying in vain to refuse it when proffered. Yancey took it cheerfully and treated the boys at the new Sunny South saloon, now a thing of splendor with its mahogany bar, its brass rail, its mirror, chandeliers, and flesh-tinted oil paintings.

The Levy Mercantile company had added a fancy grocery and market department to its three-story brick store. It was situated on the street floor and enhanced with a great plate-glass window. In this window Sol displayed a mouth-watering assortment of foods. Juicy white stalks of asparagus in glass, as large around as a man's two thumbs; great ripe olives, their purple-black cheeks glistening with oil; lobster, mushrooms, French peas, sardines, mountainous golden cheeses, tender broilers, peaches in syrup, pork roasts dressed in frills. Dozens of chickens, pounds of pork, baskets of delicacies were piled in the cars of homeward bound Osages. Often, when the food bills mounted too high, the Indian agent at Wazhazhe threatened to let the bill go unpaid. He alone had the power to check the outpouring of Indian gold, and even he frequently was unable to cope with their mad extravagances.

"It's disgusting," Sabra Cravat said, again and again. "What are they good for? What earthly good are they? Ignorant savages who do nothing but eat and sleep and drive around in their ridiculous huge automobiles."

"Keep money in circulation," Sol Levy replied, for she often took him to task after seeing a line of Indian cars parked outside the Osage Mercantile company's store.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself."

"Now, now, Sabra. Not so grand, please. I don't do like dozens of other merchants here in town. Make out bills for goods they haven't bought and give them the money. Or charge them double on the bill that the Indian agent sees, and return them the overcharge. They come in my store, they pay what the article is marked, and they get what they pay for. Inez Bull comes in and gets a silk step-in, or Sun Maker he buys twelve pounds of chicken and ten pounds of pork. I should tell them they can't have it! Let the President of the United States do it. The Big White Father."

Not only did Yancey agree with Sol, he seemed to find enormous satisfaction in the lavishness with which they spent their oil money; in the very absurdity of the things they bought.

Donna came home from a bridge party one afternoon, the creamy Venable pallor showing the Marcy tinge of ocherous rage. She burst in upon Sabra, home from the office.

"Do you know that Cim spends his time at the Big Elks' when we think he's out in the oil fields?"

Sabra met this as calmly as might be. "He's working near there. He told me he had seen them."

"Seen them! That miserable Gazelle Slaughter said that he's out there all the time. All the time, I tell you, and that he and Ruby drive around in her car, and he eats with them, he stays there, he—"

"I'll speak to your father. Cim's coming home Saturday. Gazelle is angry at Cim, you know that, because he won't notice her and she likes him."

She turned her clear appraising gaze upon this strange daughter of hers. She thought, suddenly, that Donna was like a cobra, with that sleek black head, that cold and slanting eye, that long creamy throat in which a pulse sometimes could be seen to beat and swell a little—the only sign of emotion in this baffling creature.

"I'll tell you what, Donna. If you'd pay a little less attention to your brother's social lapses and a little more to your own vulgar conduct, perhaps it would be better."

Donna bestowed her rare and brilliant smile upon her forthright mother. "Now, now, darling! I suppose I say, 'What do you mean?' And you say, 'You know very well what I mean.'"

"You certainly do know what I mean. If you weren't my own daughter I'd say your conduct with Tracy Wyatt was that of a—a—"

"Harlot," put in Donna, sweetly.

"Donna! How can you talk like that? You are breaking my heart. Haven't I had enough? I've never complained, have I? But now—you—"

Donna came over to her and put her arms about her, as though she were the older woman protecting the younger. "It's all right, mamma darling. You just don't understand. Life isn't as simple as it was when you were a frontier gal. I know what I want and I'm going to get it."

Sabra shrugged away from her; faced her with scorn. "I've seen you. I'm ashamed for you. You press against him like a—like a—" Again she could not say it. Another generation. "And that horse you ride. You say he loans it to you. He gave it to you. It's yours. What for?"

She was weeping.

"I tell you it's all right, mamma. He did give it to me. He wants to give me lots of things, but I won't take them—yet. Tracy's in love with me. He thinks I'm young and beautiful and stimulating and wonderful. He's married to a dried-up, vinegary, bitter old hag who was just that when he married her, years ago. He's never known what love is. She has never given him children. He's insanely rich, and not too old, and rather sweet. We're going to be married. Tracy will get his divorce. Money does anything. It has taken me a year and a half to do it. I've never worked so hard in all my life. But it's going to be worth it. Don't worry, darling. Tracy's making an honest woman of your wayward daughter."

Sabra drew herself up, every inch the daughter of her mother, Felice Venable, nee Marcy. "You are disgusting."

"Not really, if you just look at it without a lot of sentiment. I shall be happy, and Tracy, too. His wife will be unhappy, I suppose, for a while. But she isn't happy anyway, as it is. Better one than three. It'll work out. You'll see. Don't bother about me. It's Cim that needs looking after. He's got a streak of—of—" She looked at her mother. Did not finish the sentence. "When he comes home Saturday I wish you'd speak to him."

But Cim did not come home on Saturday. On Saturday, at noon, when Sabra and Yancey drove from the office in their little utility car to the house on Kihekah street for their noonday dinner they saw a great limousine drawn up at the curb. A chauffeur, vaguely familiar, lounged in front. The car was thick with the red dust of the country road.

A vague pang of premonition stabbed at Sabra's vitals. She clutched Yancey's arm. "Whose car is that?"

Yancey glanced at it indifferently. "Somebody drove Cim home, I suppose. Got enough dinner for company?"

Donna had gone to Oklahoma City to spend the week-end. It must be Cim.

"Cim!" Sabra called, as she entered the front door. "Cim!" But there was no answer. She went straight to the sitting room. Empty. But in the stiff little parlor, so seldom used, sat two massive, silent figures. With the Indian sense of ceremony and formality old Big Elk and his squaw had known the proper room to use for an occasion such as this.

"Why—Big Elk!"

"How!" replied Big Elk, and held up his palm in the gesture of greeting.

"Yancey!" cried Sabra suddenly, in a terrible voice. The two pairs of black Indian eyes stared at her. Sabra saw that their dress was elaborate; the formal dress reserved for great occasions. Side by side the two massive figures sat like things of bronze.

Those dull black unsmiling eyes, that weaving fan, moved Sabra to nameless terror. "Yancey!" she cried again, through stiff lips. "Yancey!"

At the note of terror in her voice he was down the stairs and in the room with his quick light step. But at sight of old Big Elk and his wife his look of concern changed to one of relief. He smiled his utterly charming smile.

"How!"

"How!" croaked Big Elk.

Mrs. Big Elk nodded her greeting. She was a woman younger, perhaps, by thirty years than her aged husband; his third wife. She spoke English; had even attended an Indian mission school in her girlhood. But through carelessness or indifference she used the broken, slovenly English of the unlettered Indian.

Now the two relapsed into impassive silence.

"What do they want? Ask them what they want."

Yancey spoke a few words in Osage. Big Elk replied with a monosyllable.

"What did he say? What is it?"

"I asked them to eat dinner with us. He says he cannot."

"I should hope not. Tell her to speak English. She speaks English."

Big Elk turned his great head, slowly, as though it moved on a mechanical pivot. He stared at his fat, round-faced wife. He uttered a brief command in his own tongue. The squaw smiled a little strange, embarrassed smile, like a schoolgirl—it was less a smile than a contortion of the face, so rare in her race as to be more frightening than a scowl.

"Big Elk and me come take you back to Wazhazhe."

"What for?" cried Sabra, sharply.

"Four o'clock big dinner, big dance. Your son want um come tell you. Want um know he marry Ruby this morning."

She was silent again, smiling her foolish fixed smile.

"God A'mighty!" said Yancey Cravat. He looked at Sabra, came over to her quickly, but she waved him away.

"Don't. I'm not going to—it's all right." It was as though she shrank from his touch. She stood there, staring at the two barbaric figures staring so stonily back at her with their dead black Indian eyes. It was at times like that that the Marcy in her stood her in good stead. She came of iron stock, fit to stand the fire. Only beneath her fine dark eyes you now suddenly saw a smudge of purplish brown, as though a dirty thumb had rubbed there; and a sagging of all the muscles of her face, so that she looked wattled, lined, old.

"Don't look like that, honey. Come. Sit down."

Again the groping wave of her hand. "I'm all right, I tell you. Come. We must go there."

Yancey came forward. He shook hands formally with Big Elk, with the Indian woman. Sabra, seeing him, suddenly realized that he was not displeased. She knew that no formal politeness would have prevented him from voicing his anger if this monstrous announcement had shattered him as it had her, so that her very vitals seemed to be withering within her.

"Sugar, shake hands with them, won't you?"

"No. No." She wet her dry lips a little with her tongue, like one in a fever. She turned, woodenly, and walked to the door, ignoring the Indians. Across the hall, slowly, like an old woman, down the porch steps, toward the shabby little car next to the big rich one. As she went she heard Yancey's voice (was there an exultant note in it?) at the telephone.

Two Massive, Silent Figures.

"Jesse! Take this. Get it in. Ready! . . . Ex-Chief Big Elk, of the Osage nation, and Mrs. Big Elk, living at Wazhazhe, announce the marriage of their daughter Ruby Big Elk to Cimarron Cravat, son of—don't interrupt me—I'm in a hurry—son of Mr. and Mrs. Yancey Cravat, of this city. The wedding was solemnized at the home of the bride's parents and was followed by an elaborate dinner made up of many Indian and American dishes, partaken of by the parents of the bride and the groom, many relatives and numerous friends of the young . . ."

Sabra climbed heavily into the car and sat staring at the broad back of the car ahead of her. Chief Big Elk and his wife came out presently, unreal, bizarre in the brilliant noonday Oklahoma sunshine, ushered by Yancey. He was being charming. They heaved their ponderous bulk into the big car. Yancey got in beside Sabra. She spoke to him once only.

"I think you are glad."

"This is Oklahoma. In a way it's what I wanted it to be when I came here twenty years ago. Cim's like your father, Lewis Venable. Weak stuff, but good stock. Ruby's pure Indian blood and a magnificent animal. It's hard on you now, my darling. But their children and their grandchildren are going to be such stuff as Americans are made of. You'll see."

"I hope I shall die before that day."

The shabby little middle-class car followed the one whirling ahead of them over the red clay Oklahoma roads. Eating the dust of the big car just ahead.

Influenza Plague Once Held Fashionable Cold

The word "influenza" came into vogue in English-speaking countries in 1890. The disease had been epidemic in St. Petersburg in 1889, and it spread over Europe and to England and the United States. In the following spring it was severe in India and Australia. In most of these countries it was known as "l'influenza," or "influenza," though in Paris "la grippe," a term used in the middle of the last century, was revived. The word "influenza" was given in Italy toward the middle of the Eighteenth century to an epidemic of febrile catarrh. It was in use in England as early as 1762. In that year Mrs. Montague, the "blue stocking," wrote: "Mr. Montague . . . returned to London quite well, though he has been much pulled down by the fashionable cold called l'influenza." A general epidemic of influenza took place toward the close of the World war, passing over western countries in three waves, the first appearing very suddenly in May and June, 1918, the second in September and October, declining in December and the third in March, 1919. Its origin was attributed by France to Spain, whence came its most frequently used designation of "Spanish influenza." Spain, in turn, attributed the outbreak to France, and this continent thought it started in eastern Europe. Virtually all the western nations were heavy sufferers. It was most virulent in the second wave.—Montreal Family Herald.

Early Life Insurance

The earliest life insurance policy of which anything definite is known was issued in 1583 in London, insuring the life of William Gybbons for a twelvemonth. This policy was underwritten by 13 persons acting individually and the premium was $80 a thousand.

"As You Like It"

Various commentators have advanced different theories as to why Shakespeare's play was given the name "As You Like It." Braithwait, however, in his "Barnaby's Journal," speaks of "As You Like It" as a proverbial motto, and this seems more likely to imply the true explanation of the title of Shakespeare's play. The title of the comedy may on this supposition be exactly parallel with that of "Much Ado About Nothing." The proverbial title of the play implies the freedom of thought and indifference to censure which characterizes the sayings and doings of most of the actors in this comedy of human nature in a forest.

Flag Smut Found in Winter Wheat

Its Presence Is Reported in Three States by Federal Experts.

Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

Flag smut, a serious wheat disease in Australia, and one now found in Illinois, Missouri, and Kansas in this country, is spreading persistently, although it has not reached dangerous proportions.

Department authorities fear flag smut may get into semiarid winter-wheat regions in the West, under growth conditions more like those in Australia, where the disease is a serious problem, and for that reason they are doing everything possible to check it in its present stage.

In Illinois the plant disease men found flag smut in one county, Macon, where it had not been found before. Counties in which it had been found before and was present this year were: Logan, Hancock, Green, Madison, and St. Clair.

In Missouri they found the flag smut in St. Louis county. It was found in Leavenworth county, Kansas, where it had previously been reported, and the scouts also discovered it in four fields south of Wallula in Wyandotte county.

Harvest Queen wheat continues more susceptible than other varieties to flag smut. Michigan Wonder is somewhat more resistant than Harvest Queen, while many of the standard varieties have proven very resistant in experimental tests at Leavenworth, Kan. The government men visited Kay and Nobile counties in Oklahoma, as that is a Harvest Queen area, and they feared a new infection there. No flag smut has been reported from Oklahoma.

Flag smut is a disease in the stem and leaves of the wheat which robs the plant of its food and prevents it from heading. Treating the seed prevents the smut except where the disease is in the soil, when the use of seed of resistant varieties is the best preventive. The department, in cooperation with the Kansas State agricultural college, is testing about 250 varieties and selections at Leavenworth, Kan., in the winter-wheat belt to develop wheat resistant to flag smut.

Great Vitality of Seeds Proved by Experiments

Here's weed news for the farmer, but it's bad.

Seeds of wild morning glory, buried for 30 years, sprouted almost at once after being unearthed and planted, the United States Department of Agriculture reports.

The seeds were buried as part of an experiment to discover how long seeds may lie in the soil and still grow, and to discover how long seeds must be buried to be killed.

The morning glory will be given further opportunity to prove its "staying power," as some seeds buried 30 years ago are still in the ground and will not be removed for ten more years.

Fertilizer Boosts Profit

George B. Harreld, Grant county, Indiana, has found that there is more profit in tomatoes and roasting ears than in field crops. Last year he raised 155 tons of tomatoes on 10 acres. The crop brought $2,170. He also raised 30 acres of sweet corn. Though it was a dry year the corn averaged three tons an acre.

"I must give a lot of the credit for my good tomato yield to fertilizer," said Mr. Harreld. "I used 200 pounds an acre of 2-8-6. I wouldn't try now to raise tomatoes without fertilizer."—Capper's Farmer.

Hardwoods Improve Pines

Quality of lumber in second-growth southern pine stands is improved by the presence of a substantial mixture of second-growth of hardwoods of the same age, recent United States forest service studies show. The shorter, broad-leaved trees help materially in shading out and causing natural pruning of the lower branches of the lines, promoting earlier formation of clear lumber in the growing pine trunks. Best results were found where the stand included approximately 20 per cent of well-distributed hardwoods.

Rations for Brood Sow

In feeding brood sows just before they farrow, one of the principal points is to keep the bowels open. Very little grain should be fed. A slop made of milk or water and millrun is the best feed. Rolled oats may be used in place of the millrun. Keep the sow a little hungry. If the bowels are not in proper condition either before or after farrowing, feed about one teacupful of crystal oil or one tablespoonful of Glauber salts in the slop once daily for several days.—Idaho Farmer.

Shade for Hogs

Hogs need shade during the hot summer days. With the advent of the swine sanitation system many hogs are raised in fields away from any natural cover. These hogs should be provided with a temporary shade, which is easily made by setting a few posts and building a frame which can be covered with short pieces of wire netting, and this then covered with a foot of straw. When the hogs are moved in the fall the entire shade can be dismantled.—Prairie Farmer.

WHAT RICHER MILK MEANS TO RAISER

Profit and Loss Affected by the Quality.

By DR. W. L. GAINES, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

Producing richer milk is a problem now confronting many dairymen, as a result of higher standards on the milk markets and the need for more efficient production.

The quick way of meeting the problem is to sell some of the cows giving low-testing milk and replace them with cows giving a high-testing product. The slow way is to select bulls of higher-testing families and gradually breed up cows producing richer milk.

Adding one or two high-testing cows cannot be expected to have much effect on herd test. Even if half the herd were replaced, the most that could be expected would be a half-way position between the cows retained and those added. As a general proposition, higher-testing cows will fall below the mid-point of the two groups. As an example, if the herd contain 100 cows giving milk testing 3.2 per cent butterfat, it would take, on the average, 110 cows giving 3.8 milk to bring the herd test to the half-way point of 3.5.

Improving the herd test through breeding is possible within certain limits. It requires continued selection over a long time. An illustration of what can be done by this means is found in the records of the Danish cattle-breeding societies. Going back to the early days of testing, the native cows in these societies in 1900 gave milk testing 3.4 per cent butterfat. By continuous selection of the higher-testing and good-producing cows as breeding stock, the test has gradually been increased until it averages 3.9 per cent butterfat at the present time. The milk is used very largely for buttermaking, and for that purpose it was an advantage to improve the fat test. It takes 6 per cent more feed to produce a pound of fat in 3.4 per cent milk than it does in 3.9 per cent milk.

Dirt and Bacteria Big Enemies of Dairyman

Losses due to poor quality in milk and cream can be traced directly to utensils that contain dirt and bacteria. To check these losses, utensils must be kept not only clean but sterile, says a writer in the Farm Journal.

Rinsing with cold water before the milk dries is the first step in cleansing. Follow this with a good scrubbing; use a brush, hot or warm water, and a good alkaline washing powder. Rinse with cold water.

So much for getting the utensils clean. The next step is sterilizing—killing bacteria, if you please. Scrubbing doesn't get rid of those. Live steam is ideal for sterilizing; but many dairy farmers don't have steam—not even an abundance of hot water.

The use of a chlorine solution insures a good job of sterilizing. It is a simple procedure—merely put the chlorine in water and wash the utensil. The chlorine wash won't take the place of scrubbing, though; it is a bacteria killer, not a dirt chaser. You must use both.

Warm Drinking Water

Here is a real argument for water in front of the cows so they will never be compelled to drink too heavily of cold water at any one time. A French investigator, E. Garillet, reports that the water supplied in winter, when very cold, caused some cases of abortion and stoppage of rumination. When the water was heated, no such troubles were encountered. The easiest way around such troubles would be water bowls or troughs in front of the cows but, lacking these, a tank heater should be considered to take the chill off the drinking water. Consider that a cow takes into her body about 400 pounds of water for each 100 pounds of milk produced and it is easy to understand that cold water in big doses could not be otherwise than harmful.

Improving the Herd

Every dairyman should have a definite program for breeding improvement. The old maxim that the bull is half the herd still holds true and the securing of a pure-bred bull with a good pedigree is the first step in such a program. In selecting the dairy bull, especially for a grade herd, it may not be necessary that an exceptionally high price be paid, but it is even more important that the record of production shown by his pedigree be high. The bull should conform to the dairy type, with plenty of constitutional vigor and capacity.—American Agriculturist.

Oust the Inferior Cow

Inferior cows pay very low prices for the feed they eat. Figures from the Minnesota state-wide cow-testing associations show that it costs 22 cents more to produce a pound of butterfat from a cow that produces 100 pounds in a year than it does from a cow that makes 400 pounds. The cow that makes 400 pounds in a year pays her owner 43 cents a bushel for oats, whereas the cow that only makes 100 pounds pays but 17 cents per bushel for oats, says Successful Farming.

POULTRY

VACCINE WILL SAVE LOSSES IN FLOCKS

Its Value Demonstrated by Experiments.

Chicken pox, a disease which annually takes a heavy toll in Illinois poultry flocks, can now be controlled with more safety as a result of experiments which the division of animal pathology and hygiene, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois, has made during the past year with different vaccines.

Pigeon pox vaccine proved superior to chicken pox vaccine, and consequently the former is being recommended to farmers and flock owners.

Proper vaccination at this season of the year will prevent losses from canker, avian diphtheria or chicken pox during the winter months, according to the laboratory. There is no medicine or serum that will cure the infection, but vaccination will prevent it. Growing stock that is running on range should be vaccinated during June, July and August. If vaccination is put off until fall, egg production may be lowered as a result of the extra handling of the birds as well as by the reaction from the vaccine.

Potent vaccines properly administered to healthy, young chickens produce an immunity against chicken pox that probably lasts for a year or longer. It is important, however, that chickens be free from intestinal parasites and other diseases before they are vaccinated.

The pigeon pox vaccine which is now being recommended causes less reaction than the chicken pox vaccine, and therefore may be used with less danger. A practical immunity is induced by the pigeon pox product. A limited supply of the vaccine prepared by the division of animal pathology and hygiene is available at a nominal cost to qualified veterinarians for demonstrational purposes. Veterinarians taking advantage of this supply are required to make a careful record of the vaccination, age and condition of the chickens vaccinated on blanks furnished for the purpose.

Keeping Poultry House Dry Not an Easy Matter

There is a fairly general opinion that dry air is lighter than damp air, and this opinion has some influence upon methods of poultry house ventilation, says the American Agriculturist. As a matter of fact, air rises as it becomes saturated with moisture, which makes it obvious that the outlet for moist, impure air should be near the top of the house if this excess moisture is to be removed by air circulation. On the other hand, the air intake should be somewhat lower, and then the fresh, cool, dry air will enter the house and accumulate near the floor, where it takes up moisture as it becomes warmer.

The principal difficulty comes during periods when the outside air is practically saturated with moisture before it enters the house. In such cases, the only practical way to keep the house dry is to raise the temperature inside the house. Although the body heat of the birds will raise the temperature some, it has been found that artificial heat is essential if the house is to be kept absolutely dry.

Brooding Problems

Chicks that are confined to a brooder house require much more room than those that are permitted to range during a part of the day. The average 10-by-12-foot brooder will accommodate only 300 chicks when confined, and from 300 to 400 when they are on range. Chicks that are reared in confinement are more susceptible to vices such as feather-pulling and cannibalism than those on range. Greater sanitation in the brooder is necessary when chicks are confined, and producers who use wire floors in the brooders escape many of the losses which sometimes are had on regular floors. Frequently, it will pay to build a wire porch on the front of the house so as to get the chicks out in the sun a part of the time.

Medicated Eggs

Most medicated or artificial nest eggs often recommended for controlling poultry parasites are nothing but ordinary naphthalene, of which moth balls are made, and are of no use whatever against lice, mites, and other parasites of poultry, says the United States Department of Agriculture. Naphthalene, explains the department, in a bulletin, does not kill or drive away poultry parasites, and may even injure good eggs and give a moth-ball flavor to the flesh.

Keep Chicks Cool

Shade is essential for successful brooding of late-hatched chicks. In early spring brooding, ninety degrees Fahrenheit at the edge of the hover is warm enough for the first week. After that the temperature can be lowered five degrees a week until 70 deegrees Fahrenheit is reached. After chicks are five weeks old they need heat only at night. With late-hatched chicks it is hard to keep the temperatures low enough and vitality is sapped.—Prairie Farmer.

Unable to Define "Will-o'-the-Wisp"

That the famous will-o'-the-wisp is a real scientific mystery, richly deserving investigation but which present-day science ignores, is emphasized by Charles F. Talman, of the weather bureau, in a recent publication of the American Nature association. The traditional idea that these dancing flames move over swamps and marshes to lure unwary travelers into the mire is obvious superstition. But it is unquestionable, says Dr. E. E. Free, that mysterious flames do appear above marshy land and have been seen by thousands of persons, including many trained scientists. The typical flames, Talman reports, are small, not very bright, usually bluish in color, nearly or quite heatless, always appear over marshy or flooded land and usually dance about over a space of a few square yards each but without progressive motion. The often quoted chemical theory that these flames are due to combustible gases set free from the marshy soil chemists themselves call impossible. Electrical theories have also been rejected on the ground that the typical will-o'-the-wisp appears when the air is not electrified. Fireflies or the luminous fungus called "fox fire" may explain some reports but cannot explain its typical occurrences. Perhaps the most plausible suggestion, Talman, thinks, is that of Prof. Fernando Sanford, of Stanford university, that luminous bacteria are lifted into the air by bubbles of gas from marsh mud. The real explanation, however, is still a mystery.

Camel-Step Surveying

The best aid in surveying the desert regions of Asia is the camel, according to Dr. Sven Hedin, Swedish traveler and explorer. In a recent newspaper article he disclosed the methods he had used for preparing his maps of the most inaccessible regions. "Anything simpler than the equipment of instruments carried by me on my travels can scarcely be conceived," he wrote. "On the whole, I use for mapping 18,000 miles of mostly unexplored territory only compass, watch, measuring tape, paper, lead pencil and one of my most important instruments—the camel. For computing the distance traveled I used as uit of measure the length of steps of my riding camel."

MISSISSIPPI DEMOCRATS vs. THE FEDERAL COURTS

Last spring the Mississippi Legislature, in accordance with the Reapportionment Act of Congress, passed a bill redistricting the State into seven instead of eight Congressional districts.

This act was contested in the courts of Mississippi where two inferior courts declared the act unconstitutional while the Mississippi Supreme Court reversed the decision of the lower courts on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

Far from content with this judgement, opponents of the act took the case to the Federal Court where a three-judge court, sitting in New Orleans, held that the act of the Mississippi Legislature was unconstitutional. The basis for this decision was that the act did not provide for a redistricting of the State along the lines of population because the principal change involved simply the combining of the old Seventh and Eighth Congressional. Districts into the new Seventh.

This new Seventh District has a population of over 400,000 while the six other districts do not exceed 250,000 population.

The court order took the form of an injunction directed against Secretary of State Walker Wood restraining him from certifying as duly nominated candidates any congressional candidates nominated at the Democratic primary by districts.

Immediately Former Governor Theo. G. Bilbo, Former Governor A. H. Longino, Congressman J. W. Collier of the old Eighth District and others announced their candidacy from the State at large.

However, the Democratic State Executive Committee, meeting in Jackson, defied the Federal injunction and announced its intention to hold the primary on August 23 by districts regardless of the Federal order. Every Congressman except Congressman Collier lined up with the Committee while Secretary of State Wood ansounced his intention to certify the nominees in defiance of the court order.

Wood and the Committee claim that the Federal Court has no jurisdiction over the Democratic Primary and that the candidates nominated by districts in the primary can be certified as the Democratic nominees from the State at large in the general election on November 8, thereby staying within the order of the Federal Court.

Bilbo, Longino, Collier and others maintain that such action would be illegal and contempt of court. Three counties, Claiborne, Warren, and Walthall, have ordered that no candidates by districts shall be voted upon by the electorate in the primary.

This is an unusual situation and raises a number of possibilities for the November election. Secretary of State Wood may be arrested for contempt of the Federal order. The Democratic Primary may be declared illegal or Congress might refuse to seat Congressmen nominated by districts in defiance of the court order.

On the other hand the Democratic State Executive Committee claims that even should the primary be thrown out the candidates nominated in the primary could still run from the State at large in November by securing petitions signed by fifty voters in each of Mississippi's eighty-two counties.

Feeling is running very high among the voters, the majority of whom are apparently backing Secretary Wood and the Committee. The Party is taking the attitude that it will have its primary anyway and take a chance at the general election. Since the House of Representatives is the final judge of the credentials of its members and since there is an excellent chance that the next House will be strongly Democratic there seems to be little for Mississippi Democrats to fear.

However, should the House go Republican, by some unlucky chance, there might be an effort made to seat the State at large Republican slate. This would cause a near rebellion in Mississippi.

At any rate the voters of Mississippi are abiding by the decision of their Executive Committee and the Federal injunction is being defied thruout the State. It is an interesting situation and will be well worth watching in November.

COTTON INSURANCE IS RULE OF STATE BOARD FOR ALL WAREHOUSES

All Cotton Stored In Public Warehouses Must Be Insured Unless Owner Requests Exemption

The Alabama Department of Agriculture is requiring that all cotton be stored in public warehouses this fall be insured against fire unless the owner notifies the ware houseman in writing not to insure it.

This was announced Friday by Seth P. Storrs, Commissioner of Agriculture who declared that this ruling was made by the State Board of Agriculture to protect farmers from losing their cotton in case the ware houses were destroyed by fire.

"Last year we had a number of complaints from farmers who had their cotton stored in ware houses which burned and did not carry insurance on the cotton stored," Mr. Storrs said. "This meant a total loss to the farmers who, in most cases thought his cotton was insured until after it was burned. To prevent this condition the Board of Agriculture has ruled that "all warehousemen shall fully insure all cotton accepted for storage unless instructed by the owner of the cotton in writing not to insure."

Commissioner Storrs advised farmers to be certain that the word "insured" be stamped upon their ware house receipts. "This shows that the cotton is insured and if the receipt does not have this on it, the cotton may not be insured."

"To make sure that this regulation be observed and see that the warehouses are conducted in such a way as to protect those using themfor storing farm products, the department of Agriculture will inspect the ware houses at frequent intervals throughout the year," he said.

ALABAMA MERCHANTS ATTEND BIRMINGHAM CONVENTION TODAY

Thousands of Merchants From All Over State Enjoy Two-Day Conclave

Thousands of merchants from every section of Alabama are expected to attend the sixteenth annual convention of the Alabama Merchants Association to be held in Birmingham August 24-25, in response to the call of Irby Hall of Collinsville, president of the Association.

W. A. Currie, general chairman of the committees on arrangements, reports all committees active in preparing for the event, and he is actively supported in the preparations for welcoming and entertaining the large hosts by the executive committee of the Wholesale Merchants and Manufacturers Divison of the Chamber of Commerce, with J. C. Hodges as chairman.

The outstanding entertainment and social event will be annual convention grad ball at the Hollywood Country Club on Wednesday night, August 24, according to plans perfected by the estertainment committee, of which Meyer N. Kronenberg is Chairman. During the ball, a snappy cabaret show will be presented and favors and souvenirs distributed, with a famous dance orchestra supplying the music.

A water carnival at the large club pool, with a junior and Senior diving and swimming contest in six separate events, and with valuable prizes to be awarded, will preside the ball from 8 to 8:30 P. M. and during the succeeding half haur will take place the "Hostess Revue" and the selection of the "Queen of the A. M. A." with appropriate ceremonies promising a rare spectacle for the visiting merchants.

MISS KROELL AND MR. TULLY MARRIED IN COLUMBIANA

Of State wide interest to a large number of friends was the marriage of Miss Dionetta Kroell of Montevallo to Hoyt A. Tully of Demopolis on Sunday night in the Court house at Columbiana. Probate Judge Cage Head officiating.

This marriage was the culmination of a romance begun in Demopolis where Miss Kroell has taught for the past few years. She is one of the most popular young women in Shelby County. Her many friends sincerely regret that her marriage will take her away from Montevallo to make her home.

Mr. Tully is a prominent young business man of Demopolis. The Democrat offers congratulations and sincere wishes for every happiness this popular couple deserves.

BOARD OF REVENUE PASSES RESOLUTION

Opposes Any Change In Allocation of Funds of Gas Tax

The following resolution was introduced by Mr. Fluker McGraw before the Board of Revenue and duly seconded and being submitted to a vote of the Board was unanimously adopted, to-wit:

BE IT RESOLVED: First, this body is unalterably opposed to any change in the allocation of funds now appropriated from the gasoline tax to the various counties of Alabama, but are heartily in favor of each county receiving from the gasoline tax the amount recently allotted to it by law and the one cent tax to be allotted on October 1, 1932, for the various counties of the State; and this body goes on record as favoring the present law and will oppose any law abrogating the two cent tax to be divided equally among the 67 counties of the State, and unequivocally favor the further allocation of the one cent gasoline tax as provided by the Tunstall Bill, to be divided equally among the 67 counties of the State, on or after October 1, 1932. We, therefore recommend to the Governor and to the Legislature that no change be made in the laws in which the 67 counties of Alabama share in the three cent gasoline tax here tofore allocated by law to the various counties of the State, and,

Second, that the State Tax Commission take cognizance of and investigate the bootlegging of gasoline in various counties of the State and through their employees, employ such means as will stop this custom, and exercise all rights and prerogatives that they have in seeing that the laws of the State are properly executed.

YOUNG MEN'S CLASS HOST TO PICNIC ON TUESDAY

The Young Men's Class of the Methodist Church were popular hosts to their friends on Tuesday night when they motored to Coosa River and staged a "Moonlight Picnic" on the picturesque island. Motor boating was the most exciting sport until the secrets of the well filled baskets were revealed.

This class, under the leadership of their teacher, Mrs. P. O. Luck has perhaps done more to promote real Community Spirit than any other organization in the town. Their little rock house constructed with funds they worked to make, is indeed a beautiful monument to their efforts and many visitors to the town journey by the Methodist Church to see it. They contemplate making this house the center of worthy activities they will sponsor thru the fall and it is to be hoped the citizens will cooperate and help them put the "dream" into a "reality".

Members of this enterprising, progressive, energetic group of young men are: Frances Leonard who for the past 8 years has held the position of President. This week he was placed in charge of a class of Junior boys, and with his past enviable record the future of this class successfully assured. Other active members include: James Leonard, James Taylor, Dick Ozley, Rux Carter, Keener Roberts, Howard Whitaker, Howard McGiboney, Alvin Stinson, Luther McGiboney, Frank Ellis, Paul Stinson, Franklin Norris, J. Workmen Now Engaged In Providing Accommodations To Serve City of 100,000 People

Ten months before its official opening, a century of progress—Chicago's 1933 International Exposition, is assuming a world's fair atmosphere. Seven major exhibit buildings are standing, six more have been begun, hundreds of workmen are busily riveting steel, fastening wall boards in place, and laying public utilities that would serve an average city of 100,000 inhabitants.

But within the two and one-half mile stretch of sheet metal fence that incloses the Exposition grounds, gayly decorated open air busses of the semi-trailer type carry sight seers from the Administration Building gate to the Travel and Transport Building and back again—3 mile run either way. FINANCE CORPORATION TO AID FARMERS AND CATTLEMEN BY LOANS

Plans Rushed For Organization Of Twelve Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations

The Reconstruction Corporation is expediting plans for twelve regional agricultural credit corporations to make loans for farmers and stockmen.

Board members have sought information from the agricultural and live stock leaders from virtually all sections of the country during the past few days.

Indications are that the corporation will announce shortly its program for creating the corporations, ordered by the huge releif bill.

Under the act, each institution is to have a paid up capital of not less than $3,000,000 to be subscribed by the Reconstruction Corporation.

The new agencies are to be managed by officers and agents appointed by Reconstruction Corporation, which is seeking men qualified to undertake the work.

The corporation may make loans for crop production and for the raising, breeding, fattening, and marketing of live stock. Paper they acquire will be eligible for discount or rediscount at any Federal Reserve or inter-mediate credit bank. The rates of interest on loans are not fixed, being left to the credit organizations.

A texas delegation headed by Representative Richard Kleberg, Southwestern rancher and a Minnesota group led by Frederick E. Murphy of Minneappolis, among others have placed information before the Reconstruction Board as to the need for urgent action.

The Texans, including Richard King of Corpus Christi, Herbert Kokernot of San Antonio, and John Lyons of Fort Worth said that by getting the corporations to functioning, live stock men of the west would be greatly benefited.

The Minnesotian advocated an increase in capitalization to $10,000,000 to spread wider the benefits of the releif act.

The loans must be adequately secured and not for more than three to five years from the date of the original years, with the extension not to exceed initial loan.

BACK TO MULE COLTS IS PLEA OF DR. CARY

The old practice of a farmer keeping enough brood mares to raise all the colts he needs and, perhaps, a few to sell may be resumed in Alabama. In fact Dr. C. A. Cary, who has spent 41 years in livestock and veterinary work in this State, is advocating it with emphasis.

As dean of veterinary medicine at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute and State veterinarian, Dr. Cary has been an important factor in livestock developments in the State. He has kept in touch with it elsewhere. He said that Alabama farmers who have kept brood mares and who are producing mule colts have acted very wisely. He advises them to continue this and that farmers who have not done so buy mares and get started

COUNTY WIDE MEETING TO BE HELD AUGUST 31

Resolutions Are Drafted To Strictest Economy

Although resolutions were drawn relative to strictest economy in Shelby County, at a recent meeting of the Economic League of Alabama, these drastic reductions will not effect any of the present office holders. Laws are now being drafted to have passed at the present session of the Legislature but will, of course not become effective until after the present officers are retired.

A county wide mass meeting has been called by Chairman H. G. Bridgewater for 10 A. M. Wednesday, August 31st, at which time the plan for Shelby County will be laid before the taxpayers of the County and if approved or amended will be placed in line for enactment for laws.

Shelby County is to be congratulated on the choice of Mr. Bridgewater for Chairman of this important movement.

GOVERNMENT LOAN OFFICE MAKES ANNOUNCEMENT

Use of the cottonseed and advances wherever necessary of four-fifths of a cent a pound on lint coton to cover such costs as picking, ginning, and farmers who borrowed money from the Government last spring, H. S. Clarke, national director of the 1932 Crop Production Loan Office, announces.

At the same time Mr. Clarke announced a policy aimed at promoting orderly marketing of the cotton upon which Federal funds have been loaned. Although crop production loans fall due November 30, 1932, farmers may store cotton in licensed warehouses to be sold at any time between storing and March 1, 1933, or they may store it with cotton cooperatives for sale by March 1 or May 1, 1933.

The new policy gives the farmer three choices in his marketing. First, he may contract to sell his cotton to a dealer for cash. Under this plan, to finance picking and other harvesting costs,n the grower may retain the seed and the dealer may advance when necessary to him four-fifths of a cent a pound and for this amount the Crop Production Loan Office waives its prior lien against the cotton in favor of the dealer making the advance.

The amount of the crop loan is then deducted from the remainder. Second, the grower may store his cotton for later sale in any Federal licensed warehouse, and retain the seed to pay harvesting costs. Finally, he may store his cotton with the Cotton Growers Cooperative Association, keep the seed to pay costs and in addition, obtain from the cooperative an advance, when necessary, of four-fifths of a cent a pound to meet costs of picking and marketing.

The plan contemplates disposal of all cotton stored as collateral against 1932 crop loans by May 1, 1933. The regulations provide that such cotton stored in Federal licensed warehouses must be sold by March 1, 1933. Cotton stored as collateral for such loans in cooperatives in an optional pool must be sold by March 1, 1933 and cotton so stored with cooperatives in a seasonal pool must be sold by May 1, 1933.

All cotton stored must be insured and warehouse receipts endorsed by the borrower to the Secretary of Agriculture. The policy gives the option of sale to the farmer, except that if at any time 80 per cent of the market price of the cotton stored as collateral is less than the amount of the full indebtedness of the borrower, then, automatically the cotton is to be sold.

COX MAY STUMP FOR PARTY NOMINEES SAY DEMOCRATIC LEADERS

Former Governor of Ohio Will Speak For Roosevelt-Garner Ticket If His Health Permits

Expectation that James M. Cox, former Governor of Ohio will take the stump for the Roosevelt-Garner ticket if his health permits, was expressed today at Democratic headquarters.

Robert Jackson, Chairman of the Speakers Bureau who described the former Governor of Ohio as "100 per cent in line", also said John W. Davis was favorably inclined toward making speeches for the ticket but his activities depended on whether he could spend the time away from his private affairs."

Meanwhile whether a third former Democratic candidate for the presidency, Alfred E. Smith, would take the stump remained a mystery.

Speaker John E. Garner went back to Washington after a round of conferences in New York which culminated in a visit to Smith in his skyscraper office.

The conference lasted an hour and the Vice Presidential candidate came out smiling.

"I went to see Mr. Smith because he is a great American and one of the out standing citizens of New York", he said, "I do not see how any leading democrat could come to New York without calling on him, and I guess it's all right to call myself a leading democrat."

"Did you talk about the campaign"? Garner was asked.

"Well, we did. I expressed the hope he would help us along. In support of the Democratic ticket. I think he will be worth as much as any one man, maybe more—yes, I'll

LEGISLATORS HEAR GOVERNOR MILLER'S INCOME TAX PLEA

Governor Criticises Sales Tax; Says Appellate Court Should Be Abolished

Governor Miller delivering his Legislative message to a joint session of the Alabama Senate and House strongly advocated an income tax, a $20,000,000 bond issue, cutting appropriations and salaries, and abolition of useless offices as the best way for Alabama to get out of her financial troubles.

The Governor criticised the sales tax as a measure designed to place the burden on the consumer and said this tax should be called a consumer's tax. On the other hand he said an income tax was the fair way to produce revenue as it would only reach those who had an income and would not reach those who were unemployed, hungry, and ragged as the sales tax would.

The Governor reiterated his often repeated assertion that Alabama's schools must not close and that Alabama's debts must be paid. He urged the Legislature to submit the income tax amendment and adjourn in time for it to be voted upon in the General Election in November. He suggested that the income tax be made applicable to incomes of 1932.

The Governor declared in his opinion that the Appellate Court of Alabama could be abolished, and the the work done by the Supreme Court without additional expenses. He also declared for the abolition of the Game warden of Alabama and placing that work in the hands of the sheriffs.

A constitutional amendment that

STATE NEWS PARAGRAPHED

A Resume Of The More Important Events Of Interest Condensed To An Epitomized Form

Jefferson County farmers held a county-wide picnic at Yarbo Park.

Fayette County High School opened Monday, Aug. 22, J. M. Brown, principal.

Sylvester V. Reaves, 54, widely known Anniston business leader, died at his home after a four-months' illness.

Impeachment charges have been drawn up against Russell County's three members of the state Legislature.

Dr. J. N. Baker, state health officer, estimated damage caused by fire at the State Health Department recently at $5,000.

Three persons were jailed in Florence and charged with arson in the burning of the Methodist Church at Shady Grove, Aug. 7.

More than 80 farmers from Pickens and Greene Counties recently accompained F. A. Rew, Carrollton, Pickens farm agent, on an inspection tour.

One of the features of the annual encampment of the Alabama National Guard at Fort McClellan, was the annual reunion of the Rainbow veterans.

A number of Walker County officials have taken voluntary salary cuts, effective Sept. 1. The money saved will revert to the general county fund.

Diplomas were awarded to 50 students at the Summer graduation exercises at Howard College. This brings the total number of graduates for the year to 142.

Pushing forward toward the goal of a more economical state government, Alabama's legislators started a long list of economy measures through legislative channels.

The wife of F. L. Fletcher, 29, who was found slain near Millbrook, Ala., said she believed her husband had been "taken for a ride because of something he knew."

Towns and cities throughout Alabama are pushing their plans to develop self-liquidating public works that will fall under provision of the unemployment relief bill.

S. B. Gibson, 48, superintendent of education for Calhoun County since 1920, died suddenly at his home in Anniston. He was stricken with a heart attack at his office.

The Fayette County School faculty, including 126 white and 200 Negro teachers, has been completed, with the exception of the Berry School, which will be announced later.

The announcement that the Bankhead Highway from Calhoun County line through Heflin to the Georgia line will soon be paved created considerable interest in Cleburne County.

Plans are being pushed by Burger-Phillips Company for remodeling buildings for their new location on Third Avenue, North, between Nineteenth and Twentieth Streets, Birmingham.

A measure to repeal the Alabama statute prohibiting the sale or possession of any beverage that "looks like, tastes like or smells like" beer was placed before the Legislature in extraordinary session.

The special train carrying national guardsmen from Montgomery and South Alabama to Fort McClellan was derailed just outside of Anniston. Although more than 600 guardsmen were on the train, none was injured.

More than 300 descendants and friends of George W. Thornton, assembled at Ashcraft Corner, near Millport, for the twenty-first annual reunion of this West Alabama family, being the largest reunion ever held in that section.

The first "flying" deputy sheriff of Alabama was commissioned in Selma by Sheriff Mark C. Tucker, of Dallas County. Odell Garrison, piloting his armed airplane, will patrol the county in search of illicit whisky stills, bandits and culprits in general.

Baldwin County has estimated that it will require approximately $1,000 per month to care for the needy and unemployed during the next five or six months, according to figures compiled by Probate Judge G. W. Humphries, who has so advised the state.

Vertus Frost, Walker County youth arrested a year ago wearing the shoes of the man whom he later confessed killing, was saved from death in the electric chair by an order from Gov. Miller communing his sentence to life imprisonment.

John R. Boyle, Birmingham attorney, charged with slaying his mother, Mrs. Jessie Boyle, will be kept under observation several weeks in county jail by Dr. W. D. Partlow, head of Bryce Insane Hospital, and other alienists who have examined him before they announce their findings.

Says WILL ROGERS

BEVERLY HILLS.—Well all I know is just what I read in the papers or what I see as I prowl about. Well the Olympics are all over, everybody has run as fast as they can, jumped as high as they can, swam as fast as they could, and now they have gone home to start practicing to start the whole thing over again. It was the most wonderful two weeks of thrills and excitement. It kept you looking nine ways to try and see half of it. It was a great job well done, by everybody connected with it.

There was many a laugh, many that dident get into the papers. There one day Ireland would like to have run off with the whole Stadium. Some doctor from away down in the south of Ireland just had one more throw with the hammer, (I dont know why they call it a hammer, its round) I would hate to have to drive a nail with it, well he just took his last heave and like to knocked down one end of the Stadium.

Then on the same day an old Long boy named Tisdall won the I think it was 400 meters hurdles, he and a Lord Burghley and by the way he was the most popular man at the games was this very titled Englishman named Lord Burghley. He owns a place in England that has ten towns located on it, thats quite a few towns, in fact thats the first time I ever heard of a man just going in for raising towns.

But I must get back to my "Gag." Well this Tisdall won the race, and I forget where the Lord finished, but it was either third or fourth. Well sir he and this Irishman went into the most wonderful and spontanious embrace you ever saw. Think of it an Irishman embracing an English Lord. If that got back to Ireland why they wouldent let him land with his medals. Ireland had a great representation, some good boxers too.

Brazil was playing Germany water polo, and they had a Hungarian referee and he kept calling fouls on Brazil. In fact he called 35 during the course of the game. Well after it was over Brazil made for him and he started hollering for a cop, but it was in his own language, and our cops couldent tell if he was hollering or cheering, and Brazil got to him, and how. They hit for every foul, then another Foreigner tried to rush over and the cops thought naturally he wanted to get in the fight, so they took care of him. Well he was the head of the whole Swimming Federation in Europe, and was trying to tell em who he was. Poor Brazil they had come up here on a Coffee Boat, and after they had been out a couple of weeks why their Government changed hands, and the new Government was trying to find out where the boat was. The Athletes dident know what Government or country they were really representing.

Met and got acquainted with a lot of our boys. There was one old Kid competing and I mean really competing, from right about twenty miles from Olagah, my old home town called Skiatook. He was a distance runner. What a place for an Olympic runner to come from, I cant imagine what he was running around there for. His name was Dawson. And say an "Injun" would like to have won the Decatholon, thats the thing where a man is supposed to do everything. This kid was named Buster Charles who used to go to Haskell Institute. He was ahead almost up to the last two events. Those big guys in that events some of em weighing well over 200 pounds, pole vaulted over 13 feet. Thats a long way for a big guy to drop.

And say if Mr Hoover had come out here and opened these games like he should have done he would have not been in Washington during that mess they had, in fact they wouldent have had it. I saw some movies of that away back couple of weeks ago, and what made it look so bad was the army going in with tanks and full war equipment. I was just thinking of the effect of that being shown all over the world. We can never go around preaching "Dissarmament" and "Brotherly Love" any more. It does look like there could have been some more sensible way out than that. I am a believer when you are at outs with a man or a Group, is not to send somebody (they always bungle it). Go out and talk it over with em, and lay your side right on the line and say, "Here there is no money in the Treasury to pay it, we dont owe it to you till its due, dont you think you have made a mistake coming here." Or whatever it was he had to say. But its all over and they are big men and are supposed to know the right thing to do in big cases. Sometimes it makes you think we dont need a different man as bad as we need different advisers for the same man.

Convicts Build a Road
A Baby Most Welcome
Bourbons Never Learn
Worth Considering

California is building a new "coast road," running north and south, close to the edge of the Pacific. It parallels the splendid roads that already run from San Diego to the end of the state and on through Oregon and Washington, to Seattle, for a total length of more than 1,500 miles.

Convicts are employed on the coast road, paid enough to help get a start when they leave prison, a better plan than leaving them locked up, to rage and mutiny. The money earned is kept for them, but if a prisoner runs away, as occasionally happens, that costs the other prisoners dearly.

The arrival of a Lindbergh boy baby is good news for the entire world.

Nothing can ever wipe out the sorrow and disgrace of the dreadful kidnaping tragedy, but it is a comfort to know that this little boy will bring comfort to his brave mother and to his father, who has conferred so much honor on his country.

It is reported that the child will be named in memory of his grandfather, the late Senator Dwight W. Morrow.

A strange story from Paris warns all elderly men of sixty-two and over to select temperamental female friends cautiously, if at all.

Police found Prince Edgar de Bourbon, with his throat cut, dead. He was sixty-two. The lady, Candelaria Brausoler, Spanish, was surprised, and told the police: "The quarrel was trivial. I killed him in a blind rage, and slashed him only twice."

When a Spanish lady, in a rage, slashes twice, that is enough. This incident proves again that "the Bourbons never learn anything."

Canada's agreement with Great Britain on tariff and business preferences are published and show that the "trade within the empire" plan has reality back of it.

Canada sells to this country more than to all the British empire, and must have considered carefully the probable consequences of making ours a decidedly less favored nation.

Production of white paper from quick growing pine in the South, needing only eleven years for regrowth, against thirty years for northern forests, is one of the things to be considered.

California does things well and successfully. The Olympiad is part of the past. Los Angeles did everything nobly and generously, and knows that it pays to do things well. With all bills paid, "surplus receipts" will be devoted to retiring state bonds issued to guarantee success for the games. California taxpayers will thus save about one million dollars.

Saving anything for taxpayers is quite unusual.

Cuba deals with a doctors' strike.

Ten thousand medical men, organized in a "National Medical Federation of Cuba," rebelling against low pay, have walked out of hospitals and sanitaria, also refusing to attend 3,000 patients confined in institutions.

President Machado, much disturbed, promises to ameliorate conditions of which the doctors complain.

The beautiful city of Pasadena, on the hillside east of Los Angeles, announces that all taxes will be cut 11 per cent. The thing has been done by revising city expenses.

That will interest other cities and annoy only those managed by men that find wealth and political power in tax expenditure.

More interesting is the fact that five cities in Kansas, four in another state, levy no taxes at all. Publicly owned light and power plants yield profits that make taxes unnecessary.

In Jacksonville, the entire tax budget amounts to only $350,000, less than $2 per inhabitant, as compared with nearly $100 per capita in one of our richest cities.

Hitler, chief of Germany's Nazis, modestly demands of Von Hindenburg, and all Germany, "power in Germany equal to that of Mussolini in Italy."

Old-fashioned Germans will remind Hitler that power such as Mussolini possesses must be earned, won. It is never handed out on a silver platter, ready to wear.

Bismarck had great power in Germany, and created the empire. But he attained his position by working for it.

The manufacturers' sales tax is coming. You may write it in your tablets, or bet on it, if you prefer. The retail sales tax, which would cause endless confusion, and be unworkable, is not coming, nor any general application of the state retail sales tax, reported to have worked well in Mississippi.

Young lady "coeds" at the Los Angeles University of California may smoke, if they choose, without concealment. One student clubhouse will be smoking headquarters, but there will be no restriction anywhere. A wise decision.

DELVE INTO RUINS OF ANCIENT TROY

Excavators There Hope for Rich Rewards.

Nine levels of ancient settlement have been identified on the mound of Hissarlik, which lies about four miles from the Dardanelles and is now accepted as the site of ancient Troy. The sixth of them is probably the remnant of Ilium's towered citadel, a fortress contemporaneous with ruined Mycenae and surrounded by fragments of massive fortification. In the several layers of rubbish and relics the archeologists can confidently trace 3,000 years of ascending civilization, from the dawn of the Bronze age to a Graeco-Roman city of the Christian era.

Possibly there is no more fascinating problem in archeology than is represented by this heap of history's leavings. Its broken treasures are eloquent of the affairs of forgotten peoples, their daily occupations and their efforts toward the adornment of their lives with a little beauty of craftsmanship. There are signs to be read in the rubbish of long periods of peace and of sudden catastrophe. And in addition there is the formidable and fascinating task of identifying known facts with the rich detail of Homer's tale of the twenty years' war and the fall of the ancient city.

Homer took every advantage of poetic license and all sorts of liberties with geographical facts. It was long doubted, indeed, whether there ever was a city called Troy, and those who believed in its existence have quarreled over its location since Demetrius of Scepsis presented an opinion on the problem in 160 A. D. But in 1882 the archeologist Schliemann felt sure he had discovered the hot and cold springs which lay beyond Troy's walls. He was probably wrong in his identification, but five years later the site of Troy was determined beyond reasonable doubt by the studies of Wilhelm Dorpfeld.

Doctor Dorpfeld, who is now seventy-nine years of age, is back at Troy today in company with an expedition from the University of Cincinnati, the first group to obtain permission of the Turks for excavations since the World war. Plenty of digging remains to be done. The city that once lay below the citadel is largely unexplored; one-fifth of it has never been touched by the archeologist's shovel. Two hundred Turkish peasants are at work under the direction of the American scholars and their associates from the schools at Athens. What they will find on the historic heights above the Trojan plain will be more than the dust and dry bones of forgotten civilization. For a blind poet of ancient Greece has told already the story of Troy, and scientific research today is recovering the facts on which it was founded.

The African Goose

Nothing definite is known of the origin of geese, according to the leading writers on poultry. It is said that they were held sacred in Egypt, 4,000 years ago. They were domesticated many centuries before the Christian era. Italy is said to be the home of domestic geese. Scientists claim that the "graylag" is the ancestor of all domestic geese. This probably arises from the fact that all of the earlier geese were gray or gray and white.

Extinct Marsupial

Remains of the diprotodon, an extinct marsupial of the Pleistocene age that was almost as large as a small elephant, have been found in great abundance in certain dried-up salt lakes of the central and south Australian deserts. The kangaroos and wombats are the nearest living relatives of this animal, which, so far as is known, was the largest of the animals that carried their young in a pouch.

Cavern to Be State Park

An old cavern, not yet fully explored, but used by the Indians for many years as a hiding place, is to be made a state park northwest of San Antonio, Texas. It is beneath 500 acres of Burnet county land near Highway 66. Hundreds of arrowheads have been found in the cavern.

If a million mothers had something to tell you

WOULD YOU LISTEN?

A MOTHER who has watched over her baby . . . day after day . . . thrilling to his every little gain . . . anxious about his smallest distress . . . Who can talk to you more understandingly than she? If a million such mothers could sit down with you now and tell you of their experience with a remarkable baby food—would you be interested?

Today, there are more than a million mothers who could tell you gladly, convincingly, of the wonderful things that Eagle Brand has done.

Year after year—by hundreds, by thousands—they write to The Borden Company, to tell their dramatic human stories. They tell of babies who grew and gained and flourished on Eagle Brand, with never a set-back. They tell of babies who have won blue ribbons and silver cups. They tell of babies—once failing, starving, because they could not digest other foods—brought back to full health by Eagle Brand. And often, they tell of handsome, healthy grown-up sons and daughters raised on Eagle Brand, and now giving this food to their babies.

She went through it and stood it, miraculously, until one grotesquerie proved too much for her strained nerves and broke them. But she went into the Indian house, and saw Cim sitting beside the Indian woman, and as she looked at his beautiful weak face she thought, I wish that I had never found him that day when he was lost on the prairie long ago. He came toward her, his head lowered with that familiar look, his fine eyes hidden by the lids.

"Look at me!" Sabra commanded, in the voice of Felice Venable. The boy raised his eyes. She looked at him, her face stony. Ruby Big Elk came toward her with the leisurely, insolent, scuffling step. The two women gazed at each other; rather, their looks clashed, like swords held high. They did not shake hands.

There were races, there were prizes, there was dancing. In the old Indian days the bucks had raced on foot for a prize that was a pony tethered at a distance and won by the fleetest to reach him, mount, and ride him back to the starting point. Today the prize was a magnificent motor car that stood glittering in the open field half a mile distant. Sabra thought, I am dying, I am dying. And Donna. This squaw is her sister-in-law. Miss Dignum's on the Hudson.

Ruby's handsome head right had bought the young couple the house just across the road from Big Elk's—a one-story red brick bungalow, substantial, ugly. They showed Sabra and Yancey through it. It was furnished complete. Mongrel Spanish furniture in the living room—red plush, fringe, brass nail heads as big as twenty-dollar gold pieces. An upright piano. An oak dining room set. A fine bathroom with heavy rich bath towels neatly hung on the racks. A shining stained oak bedroom set with a rose-colored taffeta spread. Sabra felt a wave of nausea. Cim's face was smiling, radiant. Yancey was joking and laughing with the Indians. In the kitchen sat a white girl in a gingham dress and a kitchen apron. The girl's hair was so light a yellow as to appear almost white. Her unintelligent eyes were palest blue. Her skin was so fair as to be quite colorless. In the midst of the roomful of dark Indian faces the white face of the new Cravat hired girl seemed to swim in a hazy blob before Sabra's eyes. But she held on. She felt Ruby's scornful dark eyes on her. Sabra had a feeling as though she had been disemboweled and now was a hollow thing, an empty shell that moved and walked and talked.

Dinner. White servants and negro servants to wait on them. A long table seating a score or more, and many such tables. Bowls and plate piled with food all down the length of it. Piles of crisp pork, roasted in the Indian fashion over hot embers sunk in a pit in the yard, and skewered with a sharp pointed stick. Bowls of dried corn. Great fat, black ripe olives. Tinned lobster. Chicken. Piles of dead ripe strawberries. Vast plateaus of angel-food cake covered with snow fields of icing.

Sabra went through the motions of eating. Sometimes she put a morsel into her mouth and actually swallowed it. There was a great clatter of knives and forks and dishes. Everything was eaten out of one plate. Platters and bowls were replenished. Sabra found herself seated beside Mrs. Big Elk. On her other side was Yancey. He was eating and laughing and talking. Mrs. Big Elk was being almost comically polite, solicitous. She pressed this tidbit, that dainty, on her stony guest.

Down the center of the table, at intervals, were huge bowls piled with a sort of pastry stuffed with forcemeat. It was like a great ravioli, and piles of it vanished beneath the onslaught of appreciative guests.

"For God's sake, pretend to eat something, Sabra," Yancey murmured, under his breath. "It's done now. They consider it an insult. Try to eat something."

She stirred the pastry and chopped meat that had been put on her plate.

"Good," said Mrs. Big Elk, beside her, and pointed at the mass with one dusky maculate finger.

Sabra lifted her fork to her lips and swallowed a bit of it. It was delicious—spicy, rich, appetizing. "Yes," she said, and thought, I am being wonderful. This is killing me. "Yes, it is very good. This meat—this stuffing—is it chopped or ground through a grinder?"

The huge Indian woman beside her turned her expressionless gaze on Sabra. Ponderously she shook her head from side to side in negation.

"Naw," she answered, politely. "Chawed."

The clatter of a fork dropped to the plate, a clash among the cups and saucers. Sabra Cravat had fainted.

Osage, Okla., was a city.

Where, scarcely two decades ago, prairie and sky had met the eye with here a buffalo wallow, there an Indian encampment, you now saw a twenty-story hotel: the Savoy-Bixby. The Italian head waiter bent from the waist and murmured in your ear his secret about the veal saute with mushrooms or the spaghetti Caruso du jour. Sabra Cravat, congresswoman from Oklahoma, lunching in the Louis XIV room with the members of the Women's State Republican committee, would say, looking up at him with those intelligent dark eyes, "I'll leave it to you, Nick. Only quickly. We haven't much time." Niccolo Mazzarini would say yes, he understood. No one had much time in Osage, Okla.

Twenty-five years earlier anybody who was anybody in Oklahoma had dilated on his or her eastern connections. Iowa, if necessary, was East.

They had been a little ashamed of the Run. Bragged about the splendors of the homes from which they had come.

Now it was considered the height of chic to be able to say that your parents had come through in a covered wagon. Grandparents were still rather rare in Oklahoma. As for the Run of '89—it was Osage's Mayflower. At the huge dinner given in Sabra Cravat's honor when she was elected congresswoman, and from which they tried to exclude Sol Levy over Sabra's vigorous (and triumphant) protest, the chairman of the committee on arrangements explained it all to Sol, patronizingly.

"You see, we're inviting only people who came to Oklahoma in the Run."

"Well, sure," said the former peddler, genially. "That's all right. I walked."

The Levy Mercantile company's building now occupied an entire square block and was fifteen stories high. In the huge plate-glass windows on Pawhuska avenue postured ladies waxen and coquettish, as on Fifth avenue.

The daughter of Mrs. Pat Leary (nee Crook Nose) always caused quite a flutter when she came in, for accustomed though Osage was to money and the spending of it, the Learys' lavishness was something spectacular. Hand-made silk underwear, the sheerest of cobweb French stockings, model hats, dresses—well, in the matter of gowns it was no good trying to influence Maude Leary or her mother. They frankly wanted beads, spangles, and paillettes on a foundation of crude color. The saleswomen were polite and acquiescent, but they cocked an eyebrow at one another. Squaw stuff. Now that little Cravat girl—Felice Cravat, Cimarron Cravat's daughter—was different. She insisted on plain, smart tailored things. Young though she was, she was Oklahoma state woman tennis champion. She always said she looked a freak in fluffy things—like a boy dressed up in girl's clothes. She had long, lean, muscular arms and a surprising breadth of shoulder, was slim flanked and practically stomachless. She had a curious trick of holding her head down and looking up at you under her lashes and when she did that you forgot her boyishness, for her lashes were like fern fronds, and her eyes, in her dark face, an astounding ocean gray. She was a good sport, too. She didn't seem to mind the fact that her mother, when she accompanied her, wore the blanket and was hatless, just like any poor Kaw, instead of being one of the richest of the Osages. She was rather handsome for a squaw, in a big, insolent, slow-moving way. Felice Cravat, every one agreed, was a chip of the old block, and by that they did not mean her father. They were thinking of Yancey Cravat—old Cimarron, her grandfather, who was now something of a legend in Osage and throughout Oklahoma. Young Cim and his Osage wife had had a second child—a boy—and they had called him Yancey, after the old boy. Young Yancey was a bewilderingly handsome mixture of a dozen types and forbears—Indian, Spanish, French, Southern, Southwest. With that long narrow face, the dolichocephalic head, people said he loked like the king of Spain—without that dreadful Hapsburg jaw. Others said he was the image of his grandmother, Sabra Cravat. Still others contended that he was his Indian mother over again—insolence and all. A third would come along and say, "You're crazy. He's old Yancey, born again. I guess you don't remember him. There, look, that's what I mean! The way he closes his eyes as if he were sleepy, and then when he does look at you straight you feel as if you'd been struck by lightning. They say he's so smart that the Osages believe he's one of their old gods come back to earth."

Mrs. Tracy Wyatt (she who had been Donna Cravat) had tried to adopt one of her brother's children, being herself childless, but Cim and his wife Ruby Big Elk had never consented to this. She was a case, that Donna Cravat, Oklahoma was agreed about that. She could get away with things that any other woman would be shot for. When old Tracy Wyatt had divorced his wife to marry this girl local feeling had been very much against her. Every one had turned to the abandoned middle-aged wife with attentions and sympathy, but she had met their warmth and friendliness with such vitriol that they fell back in terror and finally came to believe the stories of how she had deviled and nagged old Tracy all through their marriage. They actually came to feel that he had been justified in deserting her and taking to wife this young and fascinating girl. Certainly he seemed to take a new lease on life, lost five inches around the waist line, played polo, regained something of the high color and good spirits of his old dray-driving days, and made a great hit in London during the season when Donna was presented at court. Besides, there was no withstanding the Wyatt money. Even in a country blase of millionaires Tracy Wyatt's fortune was something to marvel about. The name of Wyatt seemed to be everywhere. As you rode in trains you saw the shining round black flanks of oil cars, thousands of them, and painted on them in letters of white, "Wyatt Oils." Motoring through Oklahoma and the whole of the Southwest you passed miles of Wyatt oil tanks, whole silent cities of monoliths, like something grimly Egyptian, squatting eunuch-like on the prairies.

As for the Wyatt house—it wasn't a house at all, but a combination of the palace of Versailles and the Grand Central station in New York. It occupied grounds about the size of the duchy of Luxembourg, and on the grounds, once barren plain, had been set great trees brought from England.

A mile of avenue, planted in elms, led up to the mansion, and each elm, bought, transported, and stuck in the ground, had cost fifteen hundred dollars. There were rare plants, farms, forests, lakes, tennis courts, golf links, polo fields, race tracks, airdromes, swimming pools. Whole paneled rooms had been brought from France. In the bathrooms were electric cabinets, and sunken tubs of rare marble, and shower baths glass enclosed. These bathrooms were the size of bedrooms, and the bedrooms the size of ballrooms, and the ballrooms as big as an auditorium. There was an ice plant and cooling system that could chill the air of every room in the house, even on the hottest Oklahoma windy day. The kitchen range looked like a house in itself, and the kitchen looked like that of the Biltmore, only larger. When you entered the dining room you felt that here should be seated solemn diplomats in gold braid signing world treaties and having their portraits painted doing it. Sixty gardeners manned the grounds. The house servants would have peopled a village.

Sabra Cravat rarely came to visit her daughter's house, and when she did the very simplicity of her slim straight little figure in its dark blue georgette or black crepe was startling in the midst of these marble columns and vast corridors and royal hangings. She did come occasionally, and on those occasions you found her in the great central apartment that was like a throne room, standing there before the portraits of her son's two children, Felice and Yancey Cravat. Failing to possess either of the children for her own, Donna had had them painted and hung there, one either side of the enormous fireplace. She had meant them to be a gift to her mother, but Sabra Cravat had refused to take them.

"Don't you like them, Sabra darling? They're the best things Segovia has ever done. Is it because they're modern? I think they look like the kids—don't you?"

"They're just wonderful."

"Well, then?"

"I'd have to build a house for them. How would they look in the sitting room of the house on Kihekah! No, let me come here and look at them now and then. That way they're always a fresh surprise to me."

Certainly they were rather surprising, those portraits. Rather, one of them was. Segovia had got little Felice well enough, but he had made the mistake of painting her in Spanish costume, and somehow her angular contours and boyish frame had not lent themselves to these gorgeous lace and satin trappings. The boy, Yancey, had refused to dress up for the occasion—had, indeed, been impatient of posing at all. Segovia had caught him quickly and brilliantly, with startling results. He wore a pair of loose, rather grimy white tennis pants, a white woolly sweater with a hole in the elbow, and was hatless. In his right hand—that slim, beautiful, speaking hand—he held a limp, half-smoked cigarette, its blue-gray smoke spiraling faintly, its dull red eye the only note of color in the picture. Yet the whole portrait was colorful, moving, alive. The boy's pose was so insolent, so lithe, so careless. The eyes followed you. He was a person.

"Looks like Ruby, don't you think?" Donna had said, when first she had shown it to her mother.

"No!" Sabra had replied, with enormous vigor. "Not at all. Your father."

"Well—maybe—a little."

"A little! You're crazy! Look at his eyes. His hands. Of course they're not as beautiful as your father's hands were—are . . ."

University of Oxford Old Seat of Learning

The university, in the modern sense, dates to the Twelfth and Thirteenth centuries as an outgrowth of earlier schools in connection with cathedrals and monasteries. This despite the fact that a number of European universities have legends carrying their origin considerably farther back—as for instance Oxford, whose tradition is that it was founded by King Alfred about 872.

Oxford dates, however, to early in the Twelfth century. The universities of Paris and Bologna, which exercised the greatest influence upon the later institutions, were founded about 1200. The oldest Spanish university is that of Salamanca, dating to 1240. The earliest Italian universites, besides Bologna, were Padua, 1222; Naples, 1224; Genoa, 1243, and Perugia, 1276. About ten others were founded in that country before 1550, and Italy was the greatest resort of students for the higher education during those times.

The University of Prague was established in 1348; the first college at Cambridge in 1257, and the University of Jagielle, in Cracow, Poland, in 1364. The University of Copenhagen dates to 1479, and of Edinburgh to 1582.

Unfortunate Chicks

At Altoona, Pa., two bantam chicks starved to death because they were unable to eat as a pigeon does—from the mouth of the mother. The bantam eggs were hatched by a pigeon along with a number of pigeon eggs. The mother pigeon accorded her mixed brood the same treatment, feeding all with her bill. The pigeons thrived, but the chicks, unable to take food from the bird's mouth, died.

A SALES TAX IS INEVITABLE

We are whole-heartedly in accord with the Governor in his speech to the legislature on Tuesday, as to the cutting of salaries, as to the drafting of new appropriation bills, as to the minimizing of all departmental personnel to the number of employees actually needed for efficiency; in that we must continue our policy of building and maintaining road systems; in that educational progress must not be impaired.

But we disagree with the Governor in regard to placing one executive in charge of our three state higher educational institutions, namely, the University of Alabama, Auburn, and Montevallo. We do not believe that one man, no matter how smart, efficient, courageous, diplomatic, and able, can possibly attend to the duties of such an office and keep the educational standards of the above mentioned schools maintained to where they stand today. We believe that rather than keeping the schools and politics separated that it will inject that issue into our higher institutions of learning to a most undesirable degree. We must avoid this. If our present educational standards are not maintained it will hamper the future education of Alabama's doctors, engineers, lawyers, chemists, and other professional men.

We most certainly disagree with the Governor in his recommendation of raising the fees placed on those students coming from other states to our state institutions. At the present, out of state student fees are on a par with those levied by Virginia, the University of Kentucky, and other institutions of higher education in neighboring states. If Alabama would raise fees beyond the institutions of other states it would discourage attendance of these students from other states, and rather than increasing revenue, as the Governor thinks would result, it would serve to reduce this source of revenue. It would certainly result in creating an unfriendly feeling on the part of people in other states toward the State of Alabama. We hope that the legislature will not act unwisely on this question.

We also disagree with our Governor on the type of tax that he thinks should be levied at this time in order to save the state's credit. If business conditions were normal we would be inclined to agree with the Governor on fostering an income tax. We firmly believe that an income tax would in one way benefit the state over a period of twenty years, and we just as firmly believe that such a tax would discourage the growth of industry and business in the state, and would not be an adequate tax to meet the emergency.

What we, the people of the State of Alabama, need is a tax that will immediately begin to pay the state out of debt; a tax that will immediately place the state on a sound credit basis, and at the same time a tax that will not place too much additional burden on an already tax burdened people.

A sales tax is the only salvation of the state. We need a tax that will be placed on every inhabitant, whether he or she be white or black. We need a tax that will not allow any property, whether it be real, personal, stocks, bonds, or otherwise, to be exempt from taxation in this state.

"This government is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people", and every right thinking man living under the protection and laws of this state, is necessarily a part of its government, and there should be no hesitancy in his willingness to assume his just share of taxation necessary to maintain the state government.

There must be a drastic reduction of expenses, a readjustment of appropriations and budgets, but even in this we must be ultra careful in not imparing efficiency.

The ad valorem tax burden must be reduced. This is necessary in view of reduced incomes from land and real estate property in these times.

It is impossible to curtail expenses sufficiently, and to lower ad valorem taxes to a point of living within the state income, not to speak of paying off past indebtedness, without some additional taxation.

We know for a fact that our sister state, Mississippi, whether she be good or bad in other respects, is making rapid progress toward paying off her indebtedness. Without her sales tax she would be hopelessly in the mire today. We have stood by and watched her progress. Mississippi's sales tax has brought forth such amazing results during the short time it has been in practice that it convinces us we are losing time by not following in her footsteps.

This is a time for action and unselfish statesmanship. We urge and insist that the legislature forget petty politics, lobbying, bargaining and the chances of winning their next political race, and write, introduce, and pass bills that will save all unnecessary expenses, reduce the ad valorem tax burdens, and levy a fair and equitable tax—the sales tax. This procedure is the only salvation of the state in its present condition.

THIS IS TYPICAL OF STATE EXTRAVAGANCE

According to a recent check up on Alabama's finances we find that during the past 12 years (1918 to 1930) expenditures of the various departments have increased over 500 per cent, while collections by the State in the form of new indirect taxes increase in rates of sale and excise taxes 447 per cent during the same period.

No wonder we are going in the hole all the time. No state or individual can keep out of debt when the out go is greater than the income. The State is now something like twenty million in debt.

In 1930 the revenue receipts of Alabama from all sources amounted to approximately $23,500,000 according to the Herald. Just where all of the money went could not be learned from the information at hand, but an increase in salaries took care of no small per cent of the increased revenues. Some of the official salaries were increased as much as 200 per cent.

Only a very small percentage of the salaries paid directly or indirectly from the treasury of the State are fixed by law, so it is impractical for us to trace the increase in salaries of more than a handful of employees of the State, these for the most part being elective officials, but we have taken seventy three state officials and traced the salary raises during the period of twelve years from 1918 to 1930, and we have a faint suspicion that salaries not fixed by law have in some instances increased in greater proportion. Here is how some of the State officials made two dollars grow where one grew before.

Governor ($2,400 appropriation for light, heat, service and other expenditures of Governor's mansion, made in 1927) $7,500 to $9,000—$1,500.

Attorney General, $3,000 to $6,000—$3,000.

State Auditor, $3,000 to $5,200—$2,200.

Chief Examiner of Accounts, $2,700 to $6,200—$3,500.

State Treasurer, $3,000 to $5,200—$2,200.

Secretary of State, $3,000 to $5,200—$2,200.

Chairman of State Tax Commission, $3,000 to $5,200—$2,200.

Four Associate Tax Commission Members, $3,000 to $4,000—$4,000.

Commissioner of Agriculture, $3,000 to $5,200—$2,200.

State Superintendent of Education, $3,000 to $6,000—$3,000.

State Superintendent of Banks, $3,600 to $6,000—$2,400.

Chief Justice Supreme Court, $5,000 to $7,500—$2,500.

Six Associate Justices of Supreme Court, $5,000 to $7,500—$15,000.

Presiding Judge Court of Appeals, $5,000 to $6,600—$1,600.

Two Associate Judges Court of Appeals, $5,000 to $6,600—$3,200.

40 Judges of Circuit Courts, $3,000 to $5,000—$80,000.

President of Public Service Commission, $3,500 to $6,000—$2,500.

Associate Members Public Service Commission, $5,000 to $5,500—$500.

Director Child Welfare Department, $3,000 to $4,000—$1,000.

Insurance Commissioner, $3,000 to $4,000—$1,000.

Commissioner of Conservation, $2,500 to $4,000—$1,500.

Adjutant General, $2,000 to $4,000—$2,000.

First Assistant Attorney General, $1,000 to $5,000—$4,000.

Second Assistant Attorney General, $1,500 to $4,000—$2,500.

Chief Clerk Secretary of State, $1,800 to $3,000—$1,200.

State Highway Engineer, $6,000 to $12,000—$6,000.

The above seventy-three State officials have had their salaries raised $152,900.00 per year. Mind you that is the raise only, not what they are being paid per year. It seems to us that they should not raise their voices when a reduction in salaries is proposed.

THE PRICE OF MENTAL LAZINESS

Public slothfulness and indifference are the best friends of high taxes. The increased cost of government must be blamed on the voters who have made it possible for the politicians to mold government to their own desires.

In 1917, the per capita cost of the general departments of the 48 state governments was $4.19. In 1917, it was $11.40. In 1860, there was one employee to every thousand persons in the country. In 1923, there were 50. In 1931, there were 100.

In 1890, the per capita cost of all forms of government was $13.56. In 1913, it was $30.24. In 1923, it was $92.01. In 1928, it was $105.20, and it has increased appreciably since then.

In 1900, the Federal Government received $7.45 per capita and spent $6.84. In 1925, it received $32.76 and spent $30.59. In 1931, a year of severe depression, it received only $27.02—but it spent $34.37, leaving us with the yawning deficit now perplexing the country.

Now tax collections approximate $10,000,000,000 a year, and local governments get twice as much as they did in 1919. In 1922, the net bonded indebtedness of the states was $837,000,000, and that of cities, towns and villages was $6,316,000,000. In the middle of 1931, the combined indebtedness of the states and local units of government was $13,500,000,000. The total indebtedness of the nation was $30,300,000,000.

These are facts and they should be sufficient to make the public think. We cannot blame the politicians for high taxes if we, as voters, do not take the actions that will slash government expenses and bring taxes down or at least, stop them from further advances. We are paying a high price for our mental laziness.

THE OBLIGATION OF A CREDITOR

In discussing the half-baked or ill-advised statements that have been made about South American securities during the great depression, an authority on that subject recently said:

"In spite of admitted over-lending and of other things which are well known, there is a large intrinsic value in Latin American securities now in the hands of the public. This fact cannot be too strongly emphasized. To sacrifice holdings, to enter into contractual relations which may prevent freedom of action, or to exchange securities for something of unknown value is the height of imprudence.

"The thing chiefly needed today is patience. Foreign creditors of United States enterprises have been patient, have suffered loss, but in the end have been satisfied in most cases. We forget quickly, but in 1916 we owed foreign countries $5,500,000,000. From the earliest times our country was developed by foreign capital, and our colonial plantations and mercantile projects were created with foreign money.

"During the long period of our national life the values of American securities and their ups and downs. Money was lost and also made. But the average was generally good. Ultimately the average will undoubtedly be similar for investment in Latin American securities.

"The United States today is a creditor nation and will have to obey the laws of creditor nations. In time, perhaps sooner than many suspect, the present stress and strain will be forgotten and we shall again be exporting capital in substantial quantities."

Despite the large exports and domestic consumption it has been estimated that 80 per cent of the timber cut from Soviet Russian forests is used as fuel.

RAMBLING REMARKS

Even if we are not really happy, it's better all around to pretend that we are.

If we want to look at the solid facts of a matter we must first drain off the sentiment. In the long run it pays to look at the cold facts even at times it is hard.

It takes half a life to learn how to live the other half and then we don't practice what we know. In the autobiography of Col. Milford W. No other class of property in the world is taxed so heavily as the automobile. With some people an automobile is a necessity whereas with others it is a luxury that keeps them from having the vital things of life they need. In several places thruout the South we have seen families that are being fed by the Red Cross and other agencies drive in to get their rations in a better automobile than the richest man in town owns. I may be wrong in my views but in my estimation a person that can drive an automobile in this day and time does not need help from any organization providing for the needy. In Mississippi we know of several cases where crops have been left in the fields and tenents go to town so that the organized charaties can feed them. What about it?

FALL GARDEN HINTS FOR HOME GARDENERS

From the gardens to the kitchen and thence to the diningroom table vegetables have moved this year in Alabama on a larger scale than ever before, and this movement will continue through the fall and into the winter. With this in view Julian Brown, extension horticulturist, Auburn, offered a few suggestions or moist land be selected because such land contains much more moisture, which is especially desirable in the fall which is ordinarily a dry season.

"Plow it thoroughly, lay it out in rows, and apply 8-4-4 fertilizer at the rate of 5 pounds per 100 feet of row, or a large amount of barnyard manure."

About planting different vegetables in late August and early September Mr. Brown suggested the following:

Turnips: Plant the Purple Top Globe and Japanese varieties. The first named variety is the best for the production of turnips, is fairly hardy, and produces a large amount of greens. The Japanese variety is the best variety for fall greens due to its resistance to lice. It yields a large amount of greens.

Kale: Siberian kale produces a large amount of greens and will stand more cold weather than any other leafy vegetables.

Tendergreen: An excellent early fall vegetables that produces greens quicker than any other vegetables.

Spinach: Resistant to cold. Will stand light freezes. Thickleaf variety best for winter.

Mustard: Good for fall but will not stand freezing temperatures.

Collards: This late in the season best results will be obtained by setting the plants.

Beets: Plant one of the Egyptian varieties.

Carrots: Plant Chantenay or Danvers variety. Will usually survive the winter in the open garden.

Radish: Handle same as spring crop. If planting late use the China Rose variety, which is for winter use.

Onions: The Perennian Tree variety, a green bunching onion, is most resistat to cold and should be included in the fall planting, particularly by those is the northern half of the State. The Bermuda is excellent, but less resistant to hard freezes.

Bush Snap Beans: These may be planted within two months of your first killing frost in the fall.

JOHNSON AND ALLEN UNDER $5,000 BOND

Hillman Johnson and Reed Allen who were arrested as suspects in the robbery of Lawley's store at Almont last week, were bound over under a $5,000.00 bond. Lovelady turned States evidence—the other two will fight it out in the courts.

undying. For the children of all ages, there are African dip, shooting galleries, and archery courses.

Last week thousands of spectators crowded to the shores of the Exposition Lagoon to witness the National Out Board Association Regatta, culminating in the race for the $10,000 commodore Eugene F. McDonald trophy, it was won by Arrell Reinking, Butler University students of Indiannopolis, whose nosed out Horace Tennes of Chicago.

The Goodyear blimp "Puritan" is making daily sight seeing trips over the exposition grounds and a captive balloon of the type used by the British, French, and American armies, offers additional thrill by carrying tourists 1000 feet into the air in a tiny wicker basket.

Lying at anchor in the lagoon off 23rd street is the ice scared ark "City of New York" which carried Admiral Richard E. Byrd to the Ross ice barrier, whence he made his flight over the South Pole.

With industrial exhibits space and special industrial exhibits buildings to the aggregate amount of $4,000,000 contracted for—the exposition management looks serenely forward to having the most comprehensive industrial exposition ever held in this country.

In addition to this 4,000,000 dollars concession contracts for entertainment and amusement amounting to $3,000,000 has been signed. The Federal Government has appropriated $1,000,000 for its exhibit, the States and Territories are expected to spend not less than $3,000,000 and foreign governments unknown millions more.

Of the original $10,000,000 debenture not issue financing the exposition, $8,000,000 have been sold and the remaining $2,000,000 will undoubtedly be placed before the exposition opens on June 1st, 1933, exposition officials believe.

in raising colts.

During the last decade many important changes in the use of mules have been made. Production in Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee has declined until it has become necessary to ship mules into Alabama from western states; and at a much bigger freight charge.

"With farm prices as they are," continued Dr. Cary, "it is necessary for farmers to hold their expenses down to the very minimum. One way to do this is to raise their mules and also to raise the feed for them as well as feed for the other livestock."

Dr.. Cary says that it is not difficult to get brood mares but that it is rather difficult to obtain satisfactory jacks. He believes, however, that this can be done.

THIS WEEK IN POLITICS

By E. BASKIN WRIGHT

GARNER ACCEPTANCE

Not to be outdone by his running mate, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in the matter of breaking precedents, the Vice Presidential candidate of the Democratic Farty broke a precedent by receiving and accepting his nomination by mail.

Long has it been customary for political parties to work up fanfare for the campaign by sending a pompous committee of representatives from all the States to "inform" the presidential candidate that he has been nominated, while a somewhat less pompous delegation "informs" the vice presidential nominee.

Each nominee then responds with a carefully prepared and wordy speech accepting the nomination thereby recording his views for the benefit of the campaign. This horseplay takes place anywhere from three to six weeks after the nominations have actually been made.

The Democratic nominees have both broken the precedent and can and will now point with pride to their desire for economy in the campaign. Governor Roosevelt accepted his nomination in person before the Chicago convention after a hurried airplane trip for that purpose. This saved Democratic politicians from forty-eight states the cost of a trip to Albany but undoubtedly denied them a great deal of pleasure attendant to the trip. The expense to Mr. Roosevelt must have been considerable.

Speaker Garner went Roosevelt one better by reducing the cost of a notification and acceptance to a minimum, namely six cents. At some future date a candidate can even reduce this to four cents with a return of the late lamented two cent stamp. Of this stupendous sum, Mr. Garner bore half while Keynoter Barkley paid the remaining three cents. Even careful Cal Coolidge could hardly have done better. It might possibly have occured to Mr. Coolidge, however, to write his acceptance on the reverse side of the letter informing him of the nomination, thereby saving stationery.

There was nothing startling about the Garner acceptance. Mr. Garner simply blamed the inefficiency of the Hoover administration and the Smoot-Hawley tariff for every ill of the American people, including the hoof and mouth disease. In addition he stood four-square on the platform, prohibition repeal and all. This is a thoroughly consistent stand for Garner who has suffered much from Hoover's efforts to steal the show from the Democratic House.

It does put both Democratic candidates on the same side of the irrepressible wet-dry issue which is considerably more than can be said for the Republican nominees.

CURTIS ACCEPTANCE

Big Chief Charlie Curtis, professional politician and professional Indian (for campaign purposes), received and accepted his nomination in the traditional way as did Mr. Hoover. No airplane rides and no postage stamps for Charlie.

It is always difficult to work up any enthusiasm over a candidate running to succeed himself for the Vice Presidency, the political grave yard in America. The Vice President occupies such an insignificant position that the public is in danger of forgetting his name.

Consequently there would have been no excitement connected with the Curtis acceptance were it not for the fact that Mr. Curtis while accepting not only the nomination but the Republican platform in toto announced that regardless of the apparent trend away from prohibition, he personally would vote dry.

With Hoover coming out for repeal and Curtis for retention of the Eighteenth Amendment the Republican prohibition plank stands out in bold relief as the most colossal piece of straddling ever to insult the intelligence of the American people.

The ridiculous feature is that both Mr. Hoover and Mr. Curtis can take exactly opposite views on the prohibition plank and still endorse it in full. Now Mr. Hoover can appeal to wet voters and Mr. Curtis to dry voters on the same platform and with a straight face.

The American voter has had his intelligence insulted many times but never more flagrantly than by this Republican prohibition plank, a triumph in fence-straddling and pussyfooting never before thought possible.

ROOSEVELT ACCUSES HOOVER OF TRYING TO EVADE PLATFORM

Republican Leadership Deliberately Misrepresenting Position Of Democratic Party

Declaring that the Democratic platform and the candidates have "fairly and squarely met" the prohibition issue, Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Democratic presidential nominee, asserted that President Hoover and the Republican leadership "stand convicted of trying to evade and confuse the issue.

"The methods adopted since the great war with the purpose of achieving a greater temperance by prohibition have been accompanied", he said, "in most parts of the country by complete and tragic failure".

Mr. Roosevelt was the guest of a Democratic rally arranged by Mayor Frank Hague of Jersey City and other state leaders. The nominees speech was the second in his road campaign.

Referring to the acceptance speeches of President Hoover and Vice Pres. Curtis, relative to prohibition, Mr. Roosevelt alluded to the 1930 gubernatorial election in New York State. He was re-elected to a second term that year.

In that year, he declared "there was a party that tried to ride two horses at the same time. The Republican Party had one foot—its candidate for Governor—on the wet horse—and the other foot—the candidate for lieutenant governor, on the dry horse. The voters of the State saw it was a circus stunt-honest

WORTHY ACTIVITIES GIVEN DURING WEEK AT BAPTIST CHURCH

Eighteenth Annual Session Of The Shelby County Association Attracts Large Crowds

The Columbiana Baptist Church has been the scene of many worthy activities during the past week. On last Tuesday and Wednesday, August 23-24, one of the largest crowds ever seen in Columbiana attended the 18th annual session of the Shelby County Association. W. J. Weldon, of Wilsonville Moderator in charge. Mr. Weldon gave an interesting and constructive talk concerning the work of the association. He stated that there were 38 churches in the county and 3,842 church members, property valued at $104,170 and $15,638 had been paid to carry on local work. 171 conversions were reported. He closed his address with an eloquent plea for further and better work.

Many notables were present among them, Dr. J. O. Colley, superintendent of the Baptist Church Orphanage at Troy, J. R. Edwards of Columbiana read the report on the orphanage. Dr. L. L. Gwaltney, editor of the Alabama Baptist was present and made an enlightening talk on Religious Literature.

Dr. W. W. Adams of Philadelphia, a native son of this County, and happily remembered by many of his friends, in response to a special request, preached the opening sermon.

The afternoon activities were taken up with the reports on Temperance, Sunday Schools, B. Y. P. U., and Missionary work, led by Dr. L. E. Barton, state secretary.

The home and spacious lawn of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Minor furnished a beautiful setting for the luncheon prepared by the ladies of the Baptist Church for the visitors.

PURCHASING POWER OF FARM DOLLAR HAS NOTABLE INCREASE

Increase Attributed To Higher Prices Of Hogs, Cattle, Cotton And Minor Crops

An increase in the purchasing power of the farm dollar was noted in the monthly review of agricultural and business conditions in the Tenth District, made public Sunday by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City.

"The index average of farm prices and the purchasing power of the farm dollar, as computed by the United States Department of Agriculture advanced five points between June 5 and July 15, the former being equal to 57 and the latter to 53 per cent of the 1909-14 average", the review states.

"The increase was attributed to higher prices of hogs, cattle, eggs, cotton and some minor crops. Since July 15, prices of hogs have declined about 50 cents per hundred weight, but prices of wheat, corn, butterfat, eggs, wool and hides have advanced somewhat and those of cattle and sheep have been comparatively steady."

Crop prospects in the district were described as "reasonably good" and livestock was said to be in good condition with an abundance of corn promised for the feeding areas, and hay crops larger than a year ago.

Retail trade "the review says" experienced somewhat more than the usual midsummer dullness, with July department store sales at new low levels. Wholesale trade also declines during July and sales were substantially smaller than for July 1931."

TENANT-OWNER FARMER PROGRAM SPONSORED BY SENATOR RIDDLE

Talledega Legislator Would Have Tenant Farmers Land Owners; Movement Is Opposed

A program to turn tenant farmers into land owners is being sponsored in the legislature by Senator Hardy Riddle of Talladega.

In a proposed constitutional amendment, Senator Riddle provides for a $2000.00 homestead exemption to all residents of the State after Sept. 30, 1935. The exemption applying to State, County and City ad valorem taxes.

"I believe in helping our substantial American citizens to become land owners" Senator Riddle said. "Many are now tenant farmers because it is cheaper to rent land than to own it and pay taxes. "If my constitutional amendment is passed and ratified by the voters, it would be more advantageous to own the land and obtain the exemption from the tax rate."

Quick opposition arose to Senator Riddle's plan after it reached the Senate Committee on Constitutional Amendments, however, agreeing to report the measure back to the Senate floor without recommendation, Senator Farmer of Houston, announced he would offer an amendment to the bill to exclude county and city taxes from the terms of the exemption.

"Our counties and cities need every cent of their tax money to operate now", Senator Farmer said, "and I am opposed to any move that would cut their receipts."

SHELBY COUNTY LOSES ONE OF MOST BELOVED AND PROMINENT WOMEN

Mrs. Drucilla Meroney McMath Known By All Shelby County Passes Away Mon. Aug. 22

By Flora Belle Surles

The life of the entire community of Montevallo and Columbiana was touched by death, Monday, August 22, of Mrs. Drusilla Meroney McMath, affectionately known by many friends and acquaintenances as "Miss Drue".

Mrs. McMath was born near Montevallo on November 13, 1840. She attended boarding school conducted by Dr. W. H. Meredith in old Reynolds Hall of Alabama College. She was reared in the cultural atmosphere of the Old Southern Plantation before the Civil War, when the home environment was rich in family devotion and the common interests of parents, brothers and sisters, friends from neighboring plantations, and uniquely flavored by the genuine adoration and mutual usefulness of colored folk.

On December 20, 1870 shortly after her 21st birthday, "Miss Drue" was married to the Hon. William M. McMath, a prominent attorney of Columbiana. For many years Columbiana remained their home. Three children were born to them, two sons, Emmett and Burwell McMath, and a daughter, Ethel McMath, now Mrs. R. B. Dawson of Montevallo.

Early in her life, Mrs. McMath joined the Baptist Church, of which she remained a faithful, active member until confined by age to her home. Her interest and her sympathy in the church and in the general community life never left "Miss Drue" but kept her mind alert against all the odds of bodily infirmity.

Left a widow by the death of her husband while still a comparatively young women, Mrs. McMath earned a livlihood for herself and her family as conductor and teacher of a private school in Columbiana, where she was widely loved and appreciated, and known among her pupils as "Auntie McMath".

During the period of advanced age she made her home with her son and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Dawson, in Montevallo. Here it was the custom of many friends, both in town and college circles, to drop in often for a friendly word with "Miss Drue" whose 83 years brought to her a wealth of human wisdom to those who knew her friendship during her last years.

Burial services were conducted from the Dawson home and at the Columbiana Cemetery at 5:00 o'clock on the afternoon of August 24, in the presence of many relatives and friends. Many tributes spoke eloquently of the appreciation of a life which had given largely to Shelby County.

Services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Fred B. Pearson, pastor of the Montevallo Baptist Church, who was assisted by the Rev. Dr. P. H. Carmichael, Pastor of the Montevallo Presbyterian Church. Pall bearers were: Judge E. S. Lyman, M. P. Jeter, O. B. Cooper, P. C. Wilson, Walter Shaw, Dr. Walter H. Trumbauer, and W. C. Weems, all of Montevallo.

Surviving relatives, besides Mrs. Dawson, include two nephews, John J. Adams of Anniston and Phil Shriner of Cincinnatti, and seven nieces, Mrs. E. W. Murray, St. Louis; Mrs. J. F. Knox and Miss Lulan Meroney, Birmingham; Mrs. W. E. Wofford, Cartersville, Ga., Mrs. W. B. Peebles, Aliceville; Miss Mildred Meroney and Miss Eloise Meroney, Montevallo.

TASK OF EXTENDING CREDIT IN HANDS OF BUSINESS MEN

Initiafive Needed In "New Satting" After Financial Crisis

Washington leaders believe the task of extending credit to make jobs is now one largely in the hands of business leaders themselves whom Mr. Hoover asked to "assume further initative and responsibility" in the "new setting" which he is convinced is here by over coming "the major financial crisis".

Teagle did not announce the make up of his committee pending further selections. He said an early meeting would be held.

LOCAL AND FOREIGN BUSINESSES RESPOND TO COTTON TREND

Three Quarters of A Million Dollars Added To Value of Cotton In Selma Warehouse

With three quarters of a million dollars added in the past six weeks to the value of cotton stored in a Selma warehouse, and with a fifty five point advance recorded in this place Saturday, when the price grazed nine cents, as 8-13-16 was paid for middling, local business interests, with those all over the country, are responding bouyantly to the tremendous stimulus which is intensified by the prediction of local agriculturists that only 50 per cent of a normal crop will be raised this season.

Warehouse figures posted at the Cotton Exchange of Fenner, Beane and Ungeleider show that 38,044 bales of cotton were on hand August 27. Receipts from August 1, were given as being 1,129 bales, which is both old and new cotton.

The advance in price which has been steadily recorded, has added approximately $20.00 per bale to the value of cotton on hand here, which will enable many farmers to pay off their debts for the current crop year and apply something on other obligations.

W. E. Morrison of the Central Alabama Dry Goods Company stated that he could not recall in 40 years experience in business such an up rush of buying in all lines. Especially is this true in the mills he stated, and he spoke also of the immediate need to replenish stocks in many lines which is leading to a generally concerted buying movement.

GARNER SO CONFIDENT OF VICTORY THAT HE WILL NOT CAMPAIGN

Says That Ticket Would Have Plurality of Six To Ten Million Votes Were Election Now

The Democratic Vice Presidential candidate, John Nance Garner, flying to Texas after an Eastern visit was convinced that the Democratic party will sweep the nation in November.

So confident is Garner of the result that he said he would not make a single campaign speech if not pressed to do so by Governor Roosevelt and Democratic leaders.

"If I had my way I'd go out to Texas and stay there until after the election" he said.

Garner said the Democratic ticket would have a plurality of 6,000,000 to 10,000,000 votes if the election was held today.

Nevertheless, the Vice Presidential candidate is expected to return for an Eastern speaking tour about the middle of September at the request of Democratic leaders.

Garner said he was satisfied that his Eastern visit convinced "the yankees" that he is not the wild radical he has been painted.

"We have had two Democrats in seventy years, Cleveland and Wilson, and the country did not go to the bow wows. Responsible people who are put in power, will take care, not only of the liberty of the people, but of their property as well".

DIRECT CAMPAIGNING GIVES PRESIDENTIAL ISSUE DEFINITENESS

Roosevelt Only Candidate To Campaign Directly During Past Week For Platform

SAYS DEMOCRATIC PARTY IS NOT "FOR SALE"

Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. Returns Home From Manilla To Campaign For Hoover

Increasing definiteness was given the presidential campaign, and the issues between the Republican and Democratic parties, by events of the week now concluding but most political activity was in the nature of ground work for the future.

Of the two candidates, Governor Roosevelt alone engaged in any direct campaigning, making a personal appeal for campaign funds to a nation-wide radio audience. His brief talk was marked by such assertions as that the Democratic party is not "for sale", that it has "no favorite group upon which it can call for large sums under promise or privilege or immunity, express or implied", and "no grundys to collect donations which are to be returned many fold through tariff increases".

On the Republican side Secretary Hurley's sharply worded challenge in Rhode Island to the Roosevelt speech at Columbus, Ohio, a week ago loomed as the most direct administration answer yet voiced to the criticisms of Hoover's policy by the Democratic candidate.

FEVERISH ACTIVITY CHARACTERIZES THE WEEK'S COTTON RISE

Main Cause of Rapid Advance In Prices Was Accounts Given of New Crop Condition

Feverish anxiety again characterized the cotton market during the past week and prices advanced rapidly making new hights almost daily for the movement and the season.

The highest levels reached were on the closing day of the week when the October option went to 9.18, a net advance of 167 points for the week. At this price October showed an advance over the low level of the season reached on June 10, of 405 points or $20.25 a bale.

While a higher stock market exerted a sympathetic influence from time to time the cotton market assumed an independent attitude and was influenced mainly by developments within the market itself, although there can be no denying that the strong upswing was influenced to a considerable extent by general improvement in the business and economic situation.

The main cause of the advance was unfavorable accounts of the condition of the new crop. There has been too much rain which has increased weevil activity and caused shedding and other forms of deterioration. The demand for contracts was not only heavy from trade but from speculators as well and there also was much buying by the out side public. This persistent buying served easily to absorb the profit taking as well as a considerable volume of hedge selling without causing more than momentary reactions.

Another stimulating influence was an improved demand for spots. Daily sales were not only large at the Texas markets where new cotton is now arriving freely but in other Southern markets as well, indicating that old crop cotton is also in good demand. The greatly increased activity in the manufactured goods market also has been a bullish influence particularly as the mills are abandoning their retrenchment policy to meet the constantly increasing volume of orders flowing in. Exports also continue liberal.

Radio Takes High Place in American Industries

Total Investment Is Now Almost Two Billions

New York.—The radio industry, barely fifteen years old, has now a total investment of $1,800,000,000 and contributes more than $500,000,000 annually to the national wealth, according to an analysis of the industry in Dun's Review. It pays out $350,000,000 each year for operating expenses, spends $50,000,000 for entertainers, and provides entertainment and instruction for nearly 17,000,000 homes scattered from Maine to California.

Of the invested capital, $150,000,000 represents the investment of radio manufacturers; $25,000,000 the investment in radio broadcasting; $1,600,000,000 in listeners' sets; and $25,000,000 the investment in commercial radio stations. It is the universal acceptance of the radio that is its best guarantee of continued popularity. To millionaire and laborer alike, it brings the vocal and instrumental genius of the world's foremost artists, reports of sporting events, political occurrences and the news of the world.

Retains Popularity.

The retail sales of radio products have fallen from the record peak in the last two years, yet this is not an indication of waning popularity for the instrument, but rather a sign of intense preparation for a period of great achievement. In fact, the drop in sales in 1931 to $309,270,000, and a decrease of 63 per cent from the $842,548,000 in 1929, which was the record year for the industry, is regarded as the natural sequence of the tumbling prices caused by the hectic activity during 1928 and 1929 when volume and volume alone was the aim of the industry.

The major networks have increased revenues over those of last year, they are expanding facilities by acquiring stations in strategic locations. Two of the principal broadcasting companies, both with a basic network of twenty-one stations, charge around $5,000 an hour for night service and $2,500 an hour for day service. Both organizations have hook-ups with fifty or more outside stations which are available at an additional charge.

Television, by being carried out experimentally, will, when developed, probably expand the field of radio.

35,000,000 Receivers.

Of the 35,000,000 receiving sets installed in homes throughout the world, almost half, or 17,000,000, are operated under licenses. Subscription licenses, part or all of which are allocated to the support of broadcasting, are paid by 13,500,000 owners. The total population of radio-licensing countries is 370,000,000, approximately three times that of the United States. These nations have one-half as many stations as the United States, and one-third of these are operated under extra-monopoly arrangement.

There are 73 countries now broadcasting in various parts of the world. Broadcasting is supported in whole or in part from licenses in 31 of these.

During the past year there was an increase of nearly 25 per cent in the number of receivers in use. The increase was world-wide.

There are now 1,423 radio broadcasting stations in the world, an increase of 33 since July, 1931. Of this number, 806 are foreign stations, operating in 70 countries, and 617 in the United States and its possessions. Of the 607 located in continental United States, New York takes first place with 52 broadcasting stations, and California second place with 43.

THE THINGS YOU HAVEN'T

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Late Dean of Men,
University of Illinois.

"It is the things you haven't," Gore said to me, "that you value most—the things that you have missed that you see in other people and that you realize, if you had had them, would have made a difference in you."

He happened to be talking in this instance of education and of the attitude which the illiterate hold toward it. I had supposed until I had time to think the matter over that the illiterate were likely to think well of their illiteracy and somewhat to look down upon those who had given their minds and their time to education, but Gore says that it isn't true. He has had a good deal of experience in attempting to interest citizens in the support of a great public school system and in directing legislation in regard to the State university of his state.

"Where I was superintendent of schools," he said, mentioning one of the big school systems of the country, "I soon learned that I got far less help in furthering any new project which I might have in mind, from the educated members of the board than from those who without formal education had come up from the ranks. The man who had not himself had high school advantages in his youth wanted his children to have these privileges, and other children as well."

I could see how he might.

"It was the same way in the state legislature when we were working for an additional appropriation for the colleges of the state. The man who made the most dramatic plea for increased appropriations had scarcely himself been through high school and admitted that not a single man, so far as he knew, from the backwoods district which he represented was at that time in college. What he did not himself have he valued for other people."

Says WILL ROGERS

BEVERLY HILLS—Well all I know is just what I read in the papers and what I see as I prowl from hither to thither. The old stock market is trying awful hard to land back on the front pages like it used to be years ago. As they say in China, it "Lost Face." You know, come to think of it, there is an expression that I dont see how we get along without. Everything in the Far East is about "Somebody Losing Face". It really dont mean that a man has lost out, or failed to make good, but it means a hundred things. Anything in the world that happens to you in the Far East, Mumps, Measels, hat blew off in Public, insulted by someone, shoes run down, throw three "Craps" in a row—anything in the world that is the least bit "Dissconcerting" or embarrasing, why that is what you call "Lost Face."

Well the old Stock Market lost so much face that its practically been headless for three years. But they are just stirring around among each other now, and the market is like a Mexican jumping bean. It jumps but for no reason at all, and nobody knows why its jumping. Course its jumping to get Republican votes in November and its got a lot of jumping to do yet.

Of course New York thinks that that is just what the whole world revolves on, they think that if the Market was good today that every man woman and child in the country should celebrate and have a big meal on the strength of the rise. When as a matter of fact Amos and Andy have more influence on the whole American public than the market.

Now lets see what else has been agitating the Natives. Jack Garner went back East a couple of weeks ago to meet his teammate and lay out schemes and deadfalls to trip the Republican, and fix it so the Democrat could walk over it. Garner they say made a fine impression. He had never been further East than Washington before, and he got so he got around New York about as good as all the foreigners that live there.

Canada has a big Congress of some kind up at Ottawa, and for a family that is kin why they got along pretty well. They all agreed to buy from each other and they will till somebody comes along and sells cheaper. But they are mighty patriotic that English Empire and when the real showdown comes they will stick togeather. Been reading a lot of criticism by our papers, of what they did. But when it comes to running their own business, that Empire dont need any great advice from us. Mighty long headed old boys in their Government. Canada is a mighty good neighbor and a mighty good customer. Thats a combination that is hard to beat.

This Hitler stuff over in Germany, I cant get the straight of it. They are kinder like the "Facistists" but still they are against the German "Facistists". There seems to be about a dozen or more different kinds of parties and they are hard to figure out. That old man Hindenburg must be a great old man. He is about the sole surviving hero of the big men in the war over there. Hitlers main strength, if I get it right, is that the present generation of the Germans had nothing to do with the big War and they should not be made to pay. Now there is a lot of foundation to that. Every man ought to pay his own debts. The only way for him to outlaw em is to die. If they did that it sure would help to discourage war if Countries knew that they were not going to be paid but just a few years and then no more, they would be mighty slow about going out to start something.

Reading in the papers what Lord Cecil said about aerial disarmement, I have seen the old man at every one of these Conferences and he is quite an authority on "Why they dont dissarm". He made rather a unique statement. He said, "I understand there should be no bombing of Civilians, but that does not eliminate aerial warfare. If bombing is to continue, I do not think that Civilians have any right to claim a particular measure of immunity." Now I dont guess we ever had thought of it in that way. War is just to kill, so one bunch cant ask for any more protection than another. He said that, "It is a great pity flying ever was invented". What about the autos, they kill more than all the wars. Their warfare is going on all the time. A War is started by somebody agreeing to fight, but the old auto just keeps on leaping em down with no previous agreement.

But everything will be fixed this Fall, if you just listen to what the candidates say. In fact thats about all we are doing now is just listening to what the candidates say. So you see even our minds are not working.

BREAKING THE NEWS TO FATHER

State Troopers Catch Quarry Leaving Jail

Watkins Glen, N. Y.—Two state troopers who spent a day and night prying into every possible corner of Schuyler county, where Charles Burke, thirty-four, of New York city, might be hiding, returned wearily to the county jail in the morning—and met Burke emerging cheerily from it.

Burke was wanted on a charge of disturbing the peace as the result of an argument with a local citizen. After the alleged argument he asked and obtained lodging in the jail for the night.

The troopers, Sergt. Jack Barry and Trooper John P. Norton, took him before a justice of the peace, who imposed a 30-day suspended sentence, and ordered him outside Schuyler county within two hours.

Expedition Organized to Wrest Treasure From Father Neptune

Seek to Salvage Liner in the Shark-Laden Waters.

Norfolk, Va.—Another fleet is off on the Rainbow Trail to a hitherto unreached pot of gold. The treasure of the Ward liner, Merida, sunk off the Virginia Capes more than twenty years ago.

Capt. Harry L. Bowdoin, in his ship Salvor, accompanied by the trawlers Sea Hawk and Sea Rambler, is now at the point, sixty miles off the coast, where the wrecked ship lies forty fathows deep in shark-infested waters.

Pinning his hopes chiefly on a diving suit he has spent 16 years in developing, the sixty-year-old seafarer was optimistic on his departure.

Captain Bowdoin, however, is not the first to be lured by the treasure of the ship which sank after being rammed by the United States Fruit company steamer Admiral Farragut on May 12, 1911. For the last twenty years romance as well as desire for material reward has beckoned the adventurous to the wreck.

All passengers of the Merida were saved, but the cargo and valuables deposited with the purser went down with the ship. There is reason to believe, therefore, that the hulk still holds twenty-two tons of half-refined gold and silver ore; bullion in bars worth at least $1,000,000; 4,000 tons of copper ore and eighty kegs of American $20 gold pieces.

Another item of the cargo which some might consider worthy of salvage was 2,000 kegs of fine Jamaica rum.

As early as 1916 a syndicate of New York bankers was formed and launched an effort to recover the Merida's treasure, but the wreck was not found and the project was abandoned.

Amputate Eagle's Wing to Save It From Death

Finleyville, Pa.—Two and a half feet of a bald eagle's wing was amputated by a veterinarian to save the bird's life after it was shot down by a farmer.

The eagle is to be turned over to the state game protector after its recovery. Dr. F. Z. Matthews, veterinarian, stated that the bird now may live 80 or 90 years.

William Caster, farmer, shot the bird as it swooped low over his chicken yard. After Caster fired the shot, the eagle swerved and grasped the muzzle of Caster's rifle in its talons. The eagle has a wing spread of six and a half feet, and it is 2,500 miles from its usual habitat.

James A. Farley, Democratic Chairman

Interesting Career of the Hustling New Yorker Who Is Directing the Roosevelt Campaign.

Director of a campaign which carried New York state Democratic by 725,000 for Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1930, manager of a movement which resulted in delegates from thirty states being committed to Roosevelt when the Chicago convention met, and his nomination after a short test of strength, James A. Farley is now directing a campaign which may result in the election of the third Democratic President since the Civil war.

Towering six feet two and a half, and weighing well over 200, Farley moves as fast as a bantam. Activity is his middle name. And, a wonderful asset in any politician, he has a photographic memory for names and faces. It works without any of the prompting secretaries or card index systems. It is just a gift.

In comes an obscure precinct worker who has met the chairman just once, and that for two minutes three years before.

"Hello, Harry," shouts "Big Jim." "How is everything down in southwest Colorado? Did you stop off at Denver and see Jack Smith on your way up?"

Checking up, one will discover that the man's name is "Harry," that he does live in southwest Colorado, and that it was Jack Smith who introduced him, so casually three years before, to Jim Farley.

And he goes back home thinking Jim Farley is a man of keen discernment, who in some occult way recognized real ability and sterling worth despite the brevity of the former meeting.

Farley is just as quick to take advantage of an opening in the enemy's armor in a political fight as he is in physical movement. It was at the Democratic national committee meeting at Washington, eighteen months before the Democratic convention met, that he so entrenched Roosevelt's strategic position that the "Allies" were never able really to break through. From that time on Farley dashed over the country, landing a leader here, and a lieutenant there, convincing some skeptic here that Roosevelt was physically fit, and persuading some doubting Thomas that despite the name Roosevelt his candidate was not secretly a Republican.

Came the convention, with its hurly burly, its all-night battle, its fights on platform, two-thirds rule and organization. Farley was in his element. He slept in taxies dashing from one appointment to another. He smoothed over prima donnas, and goaded procrastinators. He glad-handed everybody, finally emerging from what had threatened to be as bitter a fight as Madison Square garden with better feeling than anyone of Roosevelt's friends had dared hope, and inside the first week, instead of stretching out indefinitely as Madison Square garden, San Francisco and Baltimore had done.

In Politics Since Boyhood.

James A. Farley is a self-made man. He is the son of Irish Catholic parents. He was graduated from Stony Point High school in 1905 and a year later from the Packard Commercial school in New York city. He is an avid reader of biographies and a close observer of events; has a phenomenal memory and possesses the rare perception to unerringly analyze people and situations.

Mrs. Farley, nee Elizabeth A. Finnegan, is a Haverstraw girl. The marriage occurred in 1920. There are three children, Elizabeth, Ann and James, Jr. Catch Jim, Sr., on a holiday with the family and you will quickly flash the gleam in his eye that mirrors his pride in these incentives to his ambitions.

He was born in Grassy Point, Rockland county, New York, on May 30, 1888, and lived there many years before moving to Haverstraw, where he maintains a comfortable home to which some day it is his intention to retire.

Farley's interest in politics dates back to about the time he started in to master the three "Rs" in school. In 1896 Jim was only eight years old, but he tells today of his vivid recollections of the McKinley-Bryan campaign, the torch-light parades and the full dinner pail bunk that was spread even as far back as then.

Before reaching maturity Farley was a political worker in the town of Stony Point and he became a committeeman about the time he first voted. That started him actively in political leadership that has run the gamut of district leader, town leader, county leader, state leader, all the way into national prominence.

His first elective office was town clerk of Stony Point from 1912 to 1919, vacating to serve the same town as supervisor for the four years, 1920 to 1923. In 1923 he was state assemblyman from Rockland county.

In 1918-19 he was port warden by appointment of Gov. Alfred E. Smith, who in 1924 appointed him a member of the New York state athletic commission, of which he has been chairman since 1925.

From 1919 to 1929 Farley was chairman of the Democratic county committee of Rockland county, from 1928 to 1930 he was secretary of the Democratic state committee, at which time he was elected chairman of that committee.

Upon election as state chairman of the New York State Democracy in September, 1930, Farley took over Franklin D. Roosevelt's campaign for re-election to the governorship. He had five weeks in which to deliver. It was naturally a time of confusion. The depression was just being felt with its full force, the coffers of the party were empty (indeed there was a deficit) and the Republicans were waging a campaign which was intensely bitter.

Farley quickly whipped into shape an organization that reached into every section of the state. He made distribution of lithographs and literature under a new plan that trebled the efficiency of the old. He wrote thousands of letters. He was on the phone for hours every day. He sent a fleet of trucks with talkies of the candidates into the smaller villages and towns. He arranged a statewide tour for the candidates, touching the principal cities throughout the state. He put all of the principal addresses on the radio. And while doing it all he organized the finances to cover the expense.

Two weeks before election in Buffalo he predicted Roosevelt's election by 400,000 and people laughed at him. Roosevelt was elected by nearly three-quarters of a million votes and carried the whole state ticket with him.

Immediately after election, Chairman Farley began working to make the entire state militantly Democratic. He visited every county in the state during the year. He counselled weak county organizations to reorganize and inject younger blood into their committees. He saw many changes in chairmanships. He promoted meetings, dinners, social gatherings everywhere with the result that in the 1931 campaign he was able to hold the Democratic lines in the assembly that came in with the Roosevelt landslide of the year previous and to see many Republican counties elect boards of supervisors, county officers and town officers from Democratic ranks.

Captured Erie County.

Notable of his accomplishments was the settlement of the trouble in Erie county. Turmoil had existed there for years. Farley stepped in and directed a reorganization which stood the test of a bitter primary battle and then emerged from the election with control of the county board, the Buffalo city council, the district attorneyship, some judgeships and numerous minor offices. He had done what was considered impossible, brought Erie and Buffalo back to the Democrats.

On January 23, Governor Roosevelt announced his candidacy for the Presidency by allowing his name to go before the Democratic primary in North Dakota. It marked the culmination of a year's work by the governor's close personal friend, James A. Farley.

Without the aid of the usual large organization, without the fanfare of trumpets, quietly, unobtrusively, but personally, Farley and others have promoted Roosevelt to the country. Their job was easier because their candidate was outstanding. But even then leaders in other states had to be consulted, informed and enthused. A cross-continent trip, a few shorter journeys, innumerable telephone conversations and plenty of letters did the trick. Farley was the genius that carried the burden of personal communication.

In this quiet, personal effort on behalf of a friend, Farley has paralleled a statewide acquaintance with a nation-wide one. From a state leader he has emerged a national figure. It is a long trip from Grassy Point on the Hudson to front-page headlines across the length and breadth of the United States. Jim has made it in forty-four years. He is still young, still energetic, still ambitious. Where the journey will lead in the future, only time can tell. But it will still be upwards. That is Jim's way.

Keeping up a vigorous letter writing campaign is one of Jim's real attainments and he has long been known as "Jim the Penman." He likes to keep in close touch with those associated with him no matter whether it is in business, politics or social pursuits, and he has found the best way to do this is by means of the post.

Anyone who has ever had dealings with this human dynamo is, of course, familiar with his famous signature, always in green ink. When he signs his name it is to a letter dictated by himself and reread by himself. It is a personal message in the truest sense.

Writes Many Letters.

A hundred letters a day, read and answered. Multiply this by the days in the year, for he works every day, and you will get a grand total of over 35,000 personally signed epistles. Add to this a hundred thousand bulletins sent to organization workers, a few thousand telegrams, not to mention greeting cards and radiograms, and you will realize why his huge organization is always informed of what is going on and its members are always working strenuously and intelligently.

A reply to every letter is the first rule of Jim Farley's lexicon of politics. It probably makes votes. It certainly makes him friends.

Thirty thousand miles are a lot of miles. A five-hundred-mile trip on a fast railroad train will take a long night. That would mean spending every night for two months on a sleeper.

But thirty thousand miles is what Jim Farley traveled in his first year as state chairman, using every form of transportation excepting airplane. Jim still keeps on the ground. He wooed sleep to the tune of the car wheels. He sped over concrete highways in high-powered cars, he experienced the thrills of boating in powered skiffs and large liners, he even enjoyed the novelty of horse and buggy.

And all the time he was personally acquainting himself with the problems of rural communities and urban centers, of sections that depended on agriculture for their substance and on sections that depended on mining, or oil, or lumber, or industries.

In the course of a year Jim Farley will make speeches at almost a hundred banquets and luncheons. In 1931 he did this very thing of eating and speaking in every one of the sixty-two counties in New York state. It was a lesson in real democracy for all real Democrats love to eat and also love to speak.

Some weeks he would visit eight counties, speaking at four mi[illegible] luncheons and four evening di[illegible] Always he would shake hands [illegible] talk with those present and on[illegible]day would hardly be finished before the committee arrived to start the next day's activities.

Graduated from a commercial school in 1906, Farley started out to make his way in the business world. His early training had made him unafraid of hard work and his employers soon discovered that the young man from up the Hudson had that rare faculty so necessary to salesmanship—the ability to sell himself. He was quickly sent into the field, onto the firing line, out where the customers were.

As a distributor of building materials Farley is noted for having a clear knowledge of the business, a willingness to give customers perfect service and a deep understanding of construction problems of every nature. His experienced viewpoint has made him invaluable, not only to his own company, but also to the Industrial National bank of which he is a director.

The DAIRY

QUALITY OF DAIRY STOCK IS ADVANCED

Breeders of Cattle Realize Its Importance.

The progress of the dairy breeds is indicated by the increased amount of testing for production that has taken place during the past year. For instance, a report issued by the Holstein-Friesian Association of America shows that there was a 14 per cent increase in long-time record testing during 1931 as compared with the previous year. A total of 3,869 records in the ten months and yearly divisions of the Advanced Registry were reported, which is the largest number in any one year with the exception of 1924, when the high mark of 4,184 was reached. This is considered all the more remarkable in view of the fact that there were serious drought conditions in many of the leading dairy states and business conditions were none too good.

The purpose of officially testing cows is to measure their producing capacity and select breeding stock from the best. All Holstein cows and heifers tested in the ten months division during 1931 averaged to produce 15,865 pounds of milk containing 470.5 pounds fat. In the yearly division for the same period, the average yield of all tested cows and heifers was 17,023.6 pounds milk and 577.3 pounds fat. Since the time official testing was started and up to December 31, 1931, there have been 30,374 yearly tests made averaging 16,767.7 pounds milk and 569.6 pounds of fat. In addition there have been reported 10,334 ten month's tests averaging 14,044.9 pounds milk and 474.6 pounds fat. These average production figures for either milk or fat are claimed to be much higher than for any other breed.

How Dairy Profits May Be Kept at High Point

At All Times:

Use wel-bred dairy cows.

Keep cows comfortable and contented.

Treat cows gently and avoid exciting them.

Follow a regular schedule of daily work.

Weigh the milk of each cow at each milking time.

Regulate the amount of feed by the milk records and the individuality of the cow.

Allow free access to salt daily.

Supply an abundance of pure fresh water never colder than that of a deep well.

Use well-balanced rations made from a variety of feeds.

Give cows six to eight weeks of rest between lactation periods.

Follow the practice of the most successful dairymen.

Join a cow-testing association and other organizations that help one to practice up-to-date methods of managing a dairy herd.—American Agriculturist.

Three-Time Milking

"How much, on the average, does milking three times a day increase production over twice a day milking? Does three times a day milking usually pay?"

Where this is done for a short time only the increase is likely to be in the neighborhood of 10 per cent and where it is carried on for the full lactation period the increase is likely to be about 20 per cent.

The question as to whether or not it will pay depends on many things. Some feel that it pays where milk is sold at retail or at fluid milk prices but not where it is sold to be manufactured into butter or cheees. Milking three times a day increases the length of the working day or at least makes it difficult for the man caring for the dairy to get away for very long at a time. Some dairymen who have tried it believe that it pays.—American Agriculturist.

"Yessing" the Cow

If anything will make a cow crazy, it is a bite of lush green grass in spring. It will make her forget the choicest alfalfa hay, the finest mixture of grain and balancing feed.

Crazy as the cow is for this first grass, it is anything but a complete ration. The dairyman who says "Yes" to the cow's craving for early grass, and quits feeding grain, will get "No" for an answer when he asks the cow for a profit.

Grass will keep the milk coming for a little while, because it is a tonic. But when the effect of the tonic is gone, it will take no end of good feeding to build up the milk flow again.—Farm Journal.

Splendid Holstein Record

Lyons Ormsby Ava, a pure-bred Holstein cow owned by Femco Farms, Minnesota, is the one hundred and sixty-third black and white cow to produce in excess of 1,000 pounds butterfat in a year. In 365 days she produced 26,942 pounds milk containing 1,001.9 pounds butterfat or enough to supply all of the dairy needs of 270 persons for one year. She began her year weighing 1,755 pounds and closed it with a weight of 1,720 pounds.—The Holstein-Friesian Association.

Increase Value of Timber by Pruning

Foresters Advise Treating Forest Trees.

Fruit growers have pruned their trees for years to get more good fruit with its blush developed to the roslest hue, but forest trees have just grown in a finish-fight for the survival of the fittest. Now Cornell foresters advise farmers who have pine plantations that they can increase the value of the lumber about $400 to the acre by pruning.

Trees which grow close together and have a diameter of four inches or more have about seven to ten feet of stem with dead branches. These branches provide no food for the tree and if they are removed the tree grows clear wood without knots, they say.

Only the dominant trees, or about two hundred of the best trees in an acre, need to be pruned. The first pruning should be done when dead branches can be cut off as high as the pruner can reach from the ground. Two later prunings will be necessary to clear all of the first 16-foot log. They estimate that 70 per cent of the volume of a 15-inch tree is in the first log, which, if pruned, will be clear lumber.

Dairy Calves Benefited by Vitamin D in Rations

Calves eating reasonable amounts of good legume hay are likely to get enough vitamin D in their ration. On the other hand, small calves, eating little hay and getting little butterfat in their milk, may benefit from the addition of 1 per cent of cod liver oil to their grain rations. This is particularly true if such calves are raised indoors where they have no access to direct sunlight.

The need of vitamin D for dairy calves was emphasized by the prompt recovery of two calves showing symptoms of rickets at 40 weeks of age that were fed (oxidized) cod liver oil in which the vitamin D was normal but the vitamin A had been destroyed. Their improvement in appetite and general thrift of condition was marked and they grew rapidly during the next six months while the vitamin D supplement was added to their feed.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Gardening Hints

Azaleas and rhododendrons need an acid soil. This can be supplied by piling oak leaves around the base of the plant, and letting them rot there, or to some degree, by working granulated peatmoss into the soil and using it for a mulch. It must be remembered, however, that these plants are very surface-rooted, and the utmost care is required, while performing the above task to keep from breaking or disturbing these roots. When planting rhododendrons, masses of oak leaves should be put at the bottom of the hole, and a thin skin of earth placed over this. These leaves rot, and over a long period of time supply the plants with the desirable acidity.

Palatability of Pastures

A group of steers "voted" legumes—such as clovers, alfalfa, and lespedeza—the most popular pasture plants at an experiment conducted in Maryland.

They registered the "vote" in a series of pasture trials. Twenty-five different grasses and legumes were sown in one field and government pasture specialists observed which was grazed most.

The legumes led. Next came bromegrass. Following were Italian and perennial ryegrass, and meadow fescue. A mixture of the standard pasture grasses ranked next to those in palatability.—Dakota Farmer.

Rodent Control

Seed treatments with repellent substance to prevent injury by rodents and birds is not generally recommended, as the seed may be severely damaged in the process, according to G. C. Oderkirk of the United States biological survey. Instead of treating the seed with the possibility of severe damage, or delayed germination, it will be better to depend upon poisoned bait to reduce the number of destructive rodents that destroy the seed. Mechanical devices can be used quite effectively to scare off birds during the shorter period when they may cause damage.

ALL HONOR TO ROOSEVELT!

If ever there was a time in the annals of American history when men of our nation have needed to stand together at all cost, that time is now, for we are all weary after this long, hard fight. While a good many of us feel the worst is over, and on the other hand equally as many of us feel that the worst is yet to come, it is doubly important for us to do our bit, even though it may be a small bit in helping to bring our beloved nation out of the "valley of depression" back into its normal and sane methods of advancement. Our first and only hope of salvation lies in our government; therefore, it is all important that we go to the polls in November and vote for the man we feel more capable of helping our country through these trying times. One who has the courage, faith and will power that having put his hand upon the wheel of our "Ship of State" will stand steadfast despite all storms. The Republican nominee cannot measure up to that great standard of courage that has been displayed in times past, and is being displayed now, by our Democratic nominee-Roosevelt.

It was a mean thing done when some unkind person recently issued a statement declaring that Roosevelt was physically unfit to be the leader of this great republic. The kindest thing would be not to talk of the Governor's infirmity. It is conceded by all that, naturally, anyone who has a lame leg does not feel as fit as one who is not so afflicted. Everyone knows that infantile paralysis is a blasting disease, sapping the vitality not only of the muscles afflicted but of the whole body. But daily, weekly and monthly and on through the years, that man of exceeding will-power, character and faith, by the proper exercise and attention, grows stronger and less lame, more active and less the invalid. Such a man has the great Roosevelt proven to be.

It is not in a comprehensive sphere of knowledge or activity of any man living to say that Roosevelt is not equal to the Presidency of the United States. He has been more than equal to the Governorship of the state of New York. Harding went into the Presidency a well man. Wilson was in fairly good health when he took over the office. Both succumbed to its worries and cares. But, Roosevelt, entering handicapped -as he will if elected—may and undoubtedly will show himself superior in stamina to those above.

Many a man in Governor Roosevelt's place would not only have abandoned a political career, but any unnecessary form of active business life. But not Roosevelt! He has the blood of his great ancestors flowing too strongly through his veins. He has built up a wonderful resistance to worry and sickness. He has learned to take better care of himself than most people, who would indeed be fortunate should they consider his tactics. I am sure Henley had just such a person as this in mind when he wrote that penetrating and inspiring poem—"Invictus"—excerpts

"In the fell clutch of circumstance,
I have not winced nor cried aloud.
Under the bludgeonings of chance,
My head is bloody, but unbowed."

"—the menace of the years Finds, and shall find, me unafraid."

"I am the master of my fate;
I am the captain of my soul."

History teems with examples of men and women who have achieved greatness though they were blind, deaf, dumb or afflicted in other ways. There are all kinds of handicaps which must be surmounted if one would reach happiness and success. Men without education have become financial magnates. The slums have given us some of our most wonderful men and women. While as for physical disfigurments, there is Milton—whose greatest works were written during his blindness. Robert Louis Stevenson once wrote to George Meredith, his friend: "In fourteen years I have not had one day's real health; I have wakened sick and gone to bed weary; yet I have done my work unflinchingly. I have written in bed and have written out of bed; written in sickness when my whole body was torn by coughing; and written when my head swam for weakness"—but like the man Roosevelt they knew not the word defeat. When he entered the Chicago convention hall to respond to his nomination for the presidency, leaning with one hand upon a cane, and with the other upon the arm of his boy, he made indeed a heroic picture. There he was not like other men, through no fault of his own, but carrying on, and to all intents and purposes just as good, or even better, than the rest of them.

To him the spirit of a person is a thing apart and cannot be actually touched by the physical. Thus it is that the brave, steadfast, and undefeatable spirit of Roosevelt shines eternally through.

WHAT IS THE LEGISLATURE WAITING FOR?

Much has been said in the papers of the State in regard to what should be done by the Legislature while in their Special Session at Montgomery. The Governor has set forth his ideas and several representatives have introduced bills which in some respects are very good; but we still have a bill to see introduced in the Legislature that really has some constructive and worthwhile value to it.

This State is in a critical condition, a condition that has never been known before in its history. Last week the State Treasurer announced that there was only $15,000.00 left in the Treasury, with nobody's salary paid and thousand upon thousands of dollars indebtedness staring the State in the face. The Legislature passed an appropriation bill which gave them their salaries; but the State is no better off, in fact, it is worse off because the Governor had to borrow that money.

The Governor advocates an Income Tax, which he thinks will save the State. We disagree with the Governor. In the first place an Income Tax cannot give the State any relief from its depraved financial condition for a least five to seven months. What we need is relief now. In the second place, we think an Income Tax will destroy industry and hamper business in this State.

The Governor knows, the Legislature knows, and the people of this State know that we need relief immediately and that we cannot afford to wait six months or a year. If we wait on an Income Tax to bring us out of the wilderness the possibility is that we will be hopelessly lost and that we will never get out of debt.

This paper advocates a TWO PER CENT sales Tax to be levied on the wholesalers and jobbers in the State; also a thirty three and a third per cent reduction in ad valorem Tax in this State; and a homestead exemption from the ad valorem tax on every man's home equal to the homestead exemptions set out by law in the Code of Alabama.

The Governor disagrees with us in our belief of a Sales Tax on the grounds that the consumer will have to pay the Tax and that it will be an additional tax on the already to heavily burdened Tax payer of the State. This in some small respect would be true if the Legislature would pass the Sales Tax and then not reduce the ad valorem tax.

Our further answer to this statement of the Governor's is a very simple one that even a child can see and understand and it is this: When our sister State, Mississippi, passed her Sales Tax and the people of that State rose up in arms voicing their opinon that they disagreed with the Governor and the Legislature and that they also were already too heavily burdened with Taxes and that they could not afford to pay anymore; we sat by, very heavily in debt, and said that we would wait and see what the experiment would bring forth, indicating that if it was successful, then we would follow step. The experiment is very successful in Mississippi and the people are satisfied and say that their Governor and Legislature is the best the State has had in its history. Now what is our Governor and Legislature sitting by waiting for? Are they waiting for another TEN MILLION DOLLAR indebtedness before our little Income Tax can help? We challenge and say to every man who is in the Service of the Law making bodies of the State that if he will stop bargaining and do what he has been elected to do, and his conscientious duty, unafraid that he will not be elected to his most exalted position for another term of office; then they and the Governor will pass a Sales Tax and reduce the ad valorem tax of this state and exempt a mans home from ad valarem taxes up to the value of two thousand dollars.

OTHER NEWSPAPERS SAY

TURNING THE LIGHT ON OUR FAITHFUL SERVANTS

Mr. A. C. Lee of Monroeville, who fills the important dual role of editor of the Monroe County Journal and representative in the legislature is an ardent believer in "personal responsibility" in government and proceeds to call the names in his paper of those who in his judgment do not square their acts with their principles. Mr. Lee points out the type of public servant, whose name is legion, who pays eloquent lip-homage to "economy" in the abstract and when faced with the concrete opportunity to translate his devotion into something practical, either "eats his words," or completely loses the edge of his inclination. Mr. Lee says that when the House was put to the test of retaining or looping off its top-heavy roster of clerks it capitulated and foreswore its principles, voting to retain these supernumeraries intact when half the number would have served every possible requirement of the public business. When the issue was submitted "economy" sustained a solar plexus, the vote being 60 to 37.

Editor Lee with a "close-up" on the situation calls the names of those whom he pillories as betrayers of the great principle of retrenchment saying:

"The public is entitled to know certain facts and to draw whatever conclusions they may justify. It is of interest to know that R. J. Goode, of Wilcox county, who has introduced in the House the income tax measure sponsored by Governor Miller, and presumably will be the floor leader in handling it when called for passage was also the floor leader of those who opposed and defeated the economy program last Friday.

"Our friend from Butler county, Joe Poole, who has given so many 'economy' interviews to the papers recently, was among those who helped defeat the economy plans at the very first opportunity.

"We believe our readers are interested in the record of the representative from Monroe county on this question, as well as those of our adjoining counties. We give it. The following representatives from three counties supported the economy program: McGowin of Butler; Matthews of Wilcox; Swift of Escambia, Kelly of Conecuh and Lee of Monroe. The program was opposed by the following: Goode of Wilcox; Poole of Butler: Coats and Tucker of Clarke, and Beebe of Baldwin.

"The vote was taken upon a substitute for rule reported out by the rules committee. The rule reported provides for about 105 clerks for the house while the substitute, which was offered by Mr. McGowin, called for about 55 clerks. The latter number was quite ample to take care of the business of the house with ease, but the house voted to put on the 50 unnecessary ones. This surplus number of clerks will probably cost the state from $8,000.00 to $10,000.00 for the special session."

It is refreshing to have the roll called in this forthright way. One of the great evils of the American political system is the element of "impersonality" and the almost insuperable difficulty of making the representatives of the people "accountable" for their votes and acts.—The Selma Times-Journal.

CANADIAN IDEALS PUT US TO SHAME

F. P. Jones of Buffalo, to whom we are frequently indebted for clippings from Buffalo and Canadian papers, (which we seldom find opportunity to make use of,) sends one from the Welland-Port Colborne Tribune, which is most interesting in connection with the apparently rapidly growing habit of peace officers (?) in this country, to extract confessions from accused, by questionings continued for weary hour after hour, conducted often by relays and beatings and other physical tortures worthy of the dark ages—and wholly illegal, but gotten away with nevertheless.

Read of this refreshing contrast from our neighbor across our northern border:

"In the case of the man convicted at Ottawa it was established that after his arrest and while in custody in the police headquarters he was brought into the office of the chief inspector, who had the suspect sit down opposite him for interrogation. There was a detective on either side of the man. Two other detectives were in attendance more or less throughout the interrogation. The inspector's clerk was present and took down a summary of the man's story.

"Evidently the appeal court sized up this procedure as a mild type of "third degree" and decided that the trial judge was in error in admitting the story, thus given, as evidence against the accused.

"Canadian courts are decidedly careful as to the evidence upon which a man might be executed for murder. It appears that anything the accused says, once he is under arrest and in the presence of police officers, ought to be entirely voluntary. If it appears that any preasure has been exercised to get the suspect's story the latter cannot be used as evidence against him. If he volunteers to say anything the officer must warn him that anything he says may be used against him at his trial. Even then the court must be satisfied that the confession has arisen entirely from the accused's own desire to speak about the crime.

"From this it is apparent that the police must exercise great care in securing statements from crime suspects. It might be contended that the police are thus barred from reasonable avenues of information and are under restrictions that are most favorable to criminals. The court's answer to that is that it is just as essential that an innocent person should be freed of suspicion as that a guilty one should have the crime fastened on him. It is a human failing that police should be keen to secure convictions. If they failed to do that there might arise a question as to their efficiency. The law which they are supposed to enforce cannot take cognizance of such sentiment. In fact, it is a maxim in British justice that it is better that one hundred guilty should escape punishments than that one innocent person should be made to suffer."—The Fairhope Courier.

COST OF ALABAMA'S GOVERNMENT IN COTTON

"In 1918 state government in Alabama cost $7,832,939. In 1932 state government in Alabama cost over $36,000,000. That's an increase of about 362 per cent in 13 years.

"But even this incredible advance in state governmental costs does not really measure the added burden actually imposed on Alabama citizens. To give the true story, the figures should be stated, not in dollars, but in the value of commodities—then and now—from which taxes must be paid.

"The chief source of income of the greatest number of our people is Cotton. In 1918, when the cost of running of state government was $7,832,939, cotton sold for 30 cents a pound.

"In 1918 it took 52,219 bales of 30 cent cotton to pay the cost of government in Alabama. In 1932, when governmental costs had mounted to $36,000,000, cotton sold for about 6 cents a pound.

"In 1931 it took 1,208,931 bales of 6 cents cotton to pay the cost of government in Alabama.

"In brief, it took over 23 times as many bales of 1931 cotton to pay the 1931 cost of our state government as it did in 1918.

"Or put another way. In 1918 it took about 6 1-2 per cent of Alabama's total cotton crop, amounting to 800,622 bales that year to pay the 1918 cost of our state government. In 1931 it took about 85 per cent of Alabama's total cotton crop of 1,430,000 bales to pay the 1931 cost of government in Alabama.

"But in this hard times year of 1932 it would take even more—in fact, it would take ALL of Alabama's cotton crop—to meet the cost of government in Alabama, provided, it remains at the 1931 figure of $36,000,000.

"Figure it this way: Preliminary governmental estimates place Alabama's cotton crop this year at 950,000 bales. The present price in Alabama is about 7 cents a pound or $35 a bale. If the cost of operating Alabama's government this year is $36,000,000, it will require 1,028,571 bales to pay it. That is 78,571 MORE bales than it is estimated Alabama will produce in 1932.

"Think of it—over 230,000 Alabama cotton farmers, working 3,030,000 acres, can't raise enough cotton in one year to pay the cost of our state government for one year.

"The foregoing figures are for state government alone. They do not include costs of county governments or of city governments. Add these and it is evident that many other crops beside cotton would be required to foot the bill for government in Alabama.

"These figures are commended to the legislature, which is meeting now in extraordinary session, to consider ways and means of getting greater public revenues from empty private pockets."—Birmingham Realty Co's. Statement.

INCOME TAX vs. SALE TAX

Personally, we would prefer an income tax to a sales tax if one or the other was absolutely essential and inescapable. Such is not the case. The state government, exclusive of municipal and county governments, cost the people, in 1931, $36,000,000. Such an enormous expenditure is unreasonable, unnecessary, suicidal and ruinous. Drastic cuts in state expenditures would make any additional tax increase unnecessary. Lavish waste, extravagance, duplication of effort and useless expense has fastened the enormous yoke of -36,000,000 state costs per annum upon the necks of Alabama taxpayers. Sensible economy would obviate the least excuse for increasing taxes in any form.—The Greensboro Watchman.

NEWS AND VIEWS
By Thomas W. Primm

A WORN-OUT THEORY

"If I were dictator," said the editor of a liberal weekly. "I should enormously lighten the burden of taxation by having the profits of public utilities go into the pockets, not of stockholders, but of the communities which operate them, or into a general treasury."

This is not a new theory. It has been held and proposed by many public men, particularly in regard to electric utilities, and apparently represents the view of a certain minority of the public. It is, on the face of it, attractive. The only thing wrong with it is that it doesn't work.

As a matter of fact, it is really not a theory at all. It has been tried in a long list of cities, from the Atlantic to the pacific and from Canada to the Gulf. In almost all—if not all—of these cities municipal ownership of utilities has led to HIGHER taxes, not lower. Once the politicians got hold of the business, there were no profits. They were taken from the stockholders, true enough, but the public didn't get them. They disappeared, through the channels of waste, extravagance, inefficiency, incomptence, graft, poor business practices, or political mismanagement. On top of that, there have generally been large deficits—for the taxpayers to make up.

It is well enough to talk of greedy stockholders of utilities. The image produced is that of a few immensely rich men. But figures show that in one out of every four families of the country is included a utility stockholder. They are in every walk of life, of every economic strata. They run banks and shine shoes and write books and sell groceries. And when government goes into the business, it not only does so at their expense, but at the expense of all other citizens of the community.

THE FOUNDATION OF PROSPERITY

When national publications are appearing at from one-half to one-third of their inflated, post-war size, the Byron Times, published by Harry Hammond, at Byron, California, comes out with its 166-page 1932-1933 deluxe development edition showing the record of progress that is being made in Central California.

It would pay anyone to read this edition just to see that the future of the United States does not depend on the stock market or the politicians—its destiny lies in the hands of the producers of the products which provide necessities for our 125,000,000 population as well as a large part of the rest of the world.

This special edition pictures in minutest detail the activities that mantain the payrolls, provide the food and clothing and furnish the taxes to maintain government. Anyone reading it can see what a wonderful work a live publisher in a farming and manufacturing community can do to build public pride in local institutions and industries.

California owes a debt of gratitude to Editor Hammond and his able coworkers who have brought to the front such a record of assets upon which the future and prosperity of this nation rest and will go forward.

THE TAX-EXEMPTION "RACKET"

In regard to the new three per cent federal tax on electric service, the Internal Revenue Department has advised a Missouri Municipal electric plant that the plant cannot pay the bill itself but must collect it from the consumer. In other words, the Federal Government will collect the same tax on municipal electric service as it does on private electric service.

On the other hand, these municipal plants which compete with private plants that pay heavy taxes to maintain city, county and state, as well as federal government, are exempted from the local taxes which apply to private plants thereby causing tremendous losses to local public treasuries which must be made up by additional taxes on other taxable property.

If it is good business for the Federal Government to collect taxes from municipal business enterprises, why isn't it good business for the local political subdivisions in which such properties are located, to tax such properties the same as other business, to maintain local government?

There is no sound reason why a privileged class enjoying the benefits of a municipal business enterprise, should be given special favors at the hands of that enterprise at the expense of the general taxpayer who cannot possibly get any advantages from the enterprise. How long this tax-exemption "racket" for municipal business projects can be continued with an ever-mounting tax burden on all privately owned property, is a question.

AN INVESTMENT FOR LABOR AND FARM HOMES

A dollar spent for road building is mostly an investment in labor.

About eighty per cent of road building funds goes into the pockets of workman, either on the job or in industries providing food, machinery and supplies. It is estimated that during 1931 an average of two million men were employed in road work, which meant a living for some six million persons.

There has never been a better time to build farm-to-market roads than now, when the economic need for improved highways, especially in rural and farming areas, grows more intense. Prices for materials are at extremely low levels. Most important of all is the crying demand for jobs and more jobs for those who are out of work.

Every time a new road is built, or an old one improved in accord with modern design, social and economic progress is made. Fine weatherproof, bituminous surfaced roads can be built for five thousand dollars a mile and less, giving men employment and opening inaccessible areas for settlement.

DOCILE TAXPAYERS PAY

Decent government can be administered in Alabama for a mere fraction of $36,000,000. Corruption, horse-swapping, political chicanery eliminated; economy measures and retrenchment enforced in state government in keeping with the personal retrenchments that every individual and private business has been forced to make;—these measures will make it totally unnecessary to raise taxes in any form. The Alabama taxpayer is going to be taxed more and more until he is taxed into bankruptcy, unless he rises up and takes matters into his own hands. If every business man would attend a mass meeting called at each court house in Alabama, and pledge himself to defeat for office any lawmaker who refused to vote for every reasonable economy bill, and who voted for any bill to increase taxes, he would get immediate results. Until this method is taken, however, the legislature will regularly soak the docile taxpayer for every penny he can stand.

STILL CAPTURED IN SHELBY COUNTY

The sheriff's forces have been busy this week and a 400 gallon still was captured in Beat Five and two white men and two negroes were arrested and brought to the County jail charged with distilling. Deputies are also busily engaged in serving subpoenas to witnesses who have been summoned in various cases to be tried at the term of Circuit Court beginning next Monday.

COLUMBIANA PERSONAL MENTION

Youthful gaiety completely routed whatever jinx has hovered around "the number 13" on Thursday night, when a coterie of friends of Miss Elizabeth Taylor gathered at her home to celebrate her "13th anniversary".

Mid summer flowers artistically decorated the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Tom Taylor, where the happy little group of playmates gathered to pay homage to one of their most popular members. A number of games incident to the "teen age" were enjoyed and many lovely gifts tendered the honoree spoke of the esteem her many friends have for her.

Ice cream and cake were served to the following guests who were included in this charming social courtesy:

Misses Saranel Carter, Jean Letson, Nancy Wooley, Elizabeth Taylor. Master Percy and Jack Letson, Billie Riddle, Walter Crumpton, Conrad Fowler, Wales Wallace, Jr.

"If you have a friend worth loving
Love him-yes, and let him know
You love him, ere Life's evening
Tinge his brow with sunset glow"—This old bit of philosophy was typically carried out and most happily too, on Saturday night, when a number of Clarence Abbott's friends surprised him by gathering at the Court house about time for the closing of the Tax Collector's office where he is to be daily found assisting Mrs. Dixie Shealey in her duties as Tax Collector, and "took him for a ride"—the mysterious pilgrimage to the honoree ending at Yamakita, where other friends of this popular bachelor awaited his coming. The occasion for the festivities was the celebration of his birthday. A bevy of pretty girls met him and gave him the "proper salute"—a bit bashful at first, but finally succumbing to their charms, he fell into the spirit of the event and "horse shoes" and games were enjoyed-then a swim in the delightfully cool waters of Yamakita proved just the right appetizer for a deliciously prepared barbecue lunch. The honoree was then presented with a birth day cake and as he blew each little year "out"—many were the good wishes for the future years offered by those present.

Those offering congratulations included Mrs. Dixie Shealey, Mr. and Mrs. Tom Taylor, Judge and Mrs. Cage Head, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Head, Mr. and Mrs. Wales W. Wallace, Mr. and Mrs. Paul O. Luck, Mrs. Lula Evans, Miss Clarice Evans, Miss Mamie Jo Harbin, Mrs. Edna Roberts, Miss Fannie Thomas, J. M. Leonard, Jr., Miss Julia Kimbrough, Rip Head, Elizabeth Taylor, Beth Wallace, Wales Wallace, Jr., Felton Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. Calvin Weldon and others who were there and not aware of the occasion for so much happiness, left their groups and came to offer their sincere good wishes when they found out "who was the center of attraction".

Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Ellis were hosts to their visitors Miss Mary Evans Ellis and Morris Ellis of Talladega and Margaret Freeman and Mack Freeman of Wetumpka, on Wednesday night entertaining with a dance in their home. After dancing for several hours was enjoyed, a watter melon cutting on the lawn closed one of the happiest evenings spent by the collegiates this summer.

Novel indeed was the invitation received from Miss Alice Roberts for a Depression Party given in her home on Thursday night honoring her two attractive visitors, Misses Eloise Hightower and Christine Moody of Sylacauga. Guests were asked to dress their "poverty stricken roles" and appeared in various costumes typical. The prize however, for the "most depressed" fell to A. D. Gordon. Each guest was asked to present a stunt for the amusement and entertainment of the visitors and rare and original talent was given a chance to display his or her gifts in this particular field of endeavor. Never a dull or uninteresting moment during the gala occasion and those fortunate enough to have attended are unanimous in their verdict declaring it to be one of the happiest parties given this summer with Old Man Depression completely in the background and looking on with a twinkle of understanding in his sad old eyes-could but note his passing to the tune of "Happy Days Are Here Again" in spite of his erstwhile universal rule. .

Conrad Fowler was host to his Sunday School Class on Friday night entertaining most delightfully in the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Luther Fowler. This represented the first of a series of social activities to be given by the Boys Junior Class of the Methodist Church of which Frances Leonard is the newly elected teacher. Members and their friends enjoyed games and contests until the time came for a most important item on the program in the form of a water melon cutting which was most enthusiastically agreed to be the most enjoyable part of the evening..

Bob Lucas, Calera Baritone, who won the honor of representing Shelby County in the Atwater Kent Radio Audition for 1932, is leaving for a few weeks in New York where he will study until time for his presentation in Birmingham in the State Contest. Shelby County will be creditably accounted for this year as Miss Minna Peebles Johnson of Montevallo is the other contestant, and she has won many favorable comments on her excellent voice thruout the South. Much hope for first honors to Miss Johnson is being heard as her program last year was one of the last to be eliminated in a close contest.

Yamakita continues to hold its popularity for pleasure seekers and many groups from all over the County are making this the mecca for their activities. Clark Sturdivant, the general manager states that his business has been good and he is deeply grateful to his many friends for helping him make it so. The season will continue for several more weeks.

Mrs. T. H. Kirby entertained her Sunday School Class on Saturday afternoon with a picnic on the grounds of Yamakita.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Crawford were noted picnicing with a group of Birmingham friends in Yamakita Saturday night. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Bill Bolin and their attractive children, the little two year old twins who were the cynosure of all eyes. Mrs. Bolin is a sister of Mrs. Crawford's and has made many friends in Columbiana who are always happy to welcome her here.

Crowds are attending the protracted meeting being held at the Baptist Church by W. J. Ray.

Will Bird, prominent attorney of Phoenix City and former resident of Columbiana was being warmly welcomed in the city Saturday by his old friends.

Joe Bird, former County Treasurer of Shelby County, and now residing in Phoenix City, spent several days in Columbiana this week with his friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovits and Mr. and Mrs. Elmer McGiboney motored to Selma for the week end.

Miss Myrtice Acker who has been spending a few days with her sister, Mrs. John Curlee, has returned to her home in Birmingham.

Mrs. L. L. Saxon entertained the guests of Miss Alice Roberts, Miss Christine Moody and Miss Eloise Hightower, with a swimming party in picturesque Yamakita on Friday night. These attractive visitors from Sylacauga have been the inspiration for many lovely courtesies since their arrival and this week holds in store a round of gaieties arranged for their entertainment.

Percy and Tom Lee of Montevallo were visitors to Columbiana Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. William Teague who have been spending the week in Birmingham have returned to Columbiana.

Miss Dorothy Parker is home again after visiting friends in Jasper.

Felton Goodwin attended the wedding of Miss Florine Bell in Vincent Thursday night.

Harry Gordon and Rip Cox motored to Birmingham to the ball game Friday.

Mrs. Sam Goldberg, Mrs. Harry Marks and Mrs. Abe Isaacson of Selma are the charming house guests of Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovits.

Dr. and Mrs. H. T. Hamner, Mrs. H. D. Land and son, E. W. Land formed a congenial week end party to which Mr. and Mrs. Ollie Miles were hosts in their attractive apartment. Dr. Hamner is a prominent physician of Camp Hill and is the father of Mrs. Miles. Mrs. Hamner has visited here many times and her friends were delighted to have her in Columbiana again.

Mrs. Knox Wooley and Mrs. J. Bates motored to Birmingham Monday.

Miss Katherine Flemming, after a delightful visit to Mr. and Mrs. Charlie Nivens, returned to her home in Raleigh, N. C. last week.

Buck Neil, a former resident of Columbiana, was a visiter here Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovits narrowly escaped serious injury on Sunday night when they were returning from Selma in their car and were struck by a hit and run driver smashing their fenders and nearly capsizing their car. The driver of the automobile never did stop.

Harry Gilmore, after a visit to Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Lauderdale, returned to his home in Marion Junction. He will re-enter Auburn this Fall.

One of the heaviest dockets ever set for trial in Circuit Court will be sounded next Monday morning, September 5th with Judge Preston Gay presiding. There are 72 criminal cases and 34 civil cases to be tried.

The new 1933 blue and white automobile license plates for Shelby County have arrived here for distribution, Probate Judge, Cage Head announces. The new automobile tags with white numbers on a blue background, will be distributed to car owners beginning October 1. The last day for obtaining tags will be November 14. After this a penalty of 15 per cent for delinquence and $1.50 for a citation fee will be charged.

The High School and City School of Columbiana will swing wide their doors on next Monday morning for another season's work. The same efficient corps of teachers will be in charge of the students this year. Prof. T. H. Kirby, principal of the Shelby County High School is enthusiastically planning a year filled with many activities in which he hopes a large number of students will be interested. The personnel of the City School is in deed a happy one with the efficient Miss Irene Bishop in charge, assisted by Miss Gertrude Bishop, Mrs. Charlie Nivens Miss Mary Wooley and Mrs. Taylor and Mrs. Lillie McKnight.

The opening exercises will take place in the High School Auditorium next Monday morning at 9 o'clock. 'veryone interested in the school is urgently invited to attend.

Rev. and Mrs. T. K. Roberts were called to Birmingham Monday on account of the death of Mr. C. C. Whittle of Ensley. Mr. and Mrs. Whittle have visited here a number of times and their many friends will regret to learn of his passing.

Miss Agnes Wingard spent Monday in Birmingham.

Hon. Paul O. Luck is in Montgomery attending to legal business.

The Collegiates, who have kept things going at a lively clip here this summer, are beginning to make their plans for serious work this next season and many will return to the University, Alabama College and Auburn to pursue their various courses. Atinge of sadness at their going will mingle with our good wishes for their happiness and success during the coming semesters.

Friends of Mrs. Neil Stinson will be glad to learn that she is getting along nicely in a Birmingham Infirmary after an operation for appendicitis.

Jack White who was carried to a Birmingham Infirmary last week, we are happy to announce has been brought home and is speedily recovering.

Bun White of the Sheriff's force is ill at his home in Columbiana.

Walter Shaw, popular New York Life Insurance salesman of Montevallo, spent Monday in Columbiana.

Here is a suggestion sent to us this week we take pleasue in passing on to you. "Why not print Hoover's picture on the new three cent stamps and he'll take a licking he'll never forget instead of taking it out on Washington.

Bob Cooper of Sterrett was a visitor to the city on Monday.

L. G. Nunnaly who has been serving on the petit Jury in Birmingham has returned to Columbiana. He states that 20 cases were disposed of by trial in the 5 days he served in this capacity.

Miss Eula Dillard of Birmingham, Miss Ida Lee Cowling and Miss Bessie Milner of Gulfport, Miss., are visiting Miss Catherine Parker this week.

Mr. and Mrs. William W. Teague are motoring to Gulfport, Miss., Wednesday, where they will be entertained for a few days at the home of Dr. Ed Parker.

Mrs. Helen Leeper is being happily welcomed back to Columbiana for a short visit before going to Sewanee, Tenn. for the winter.

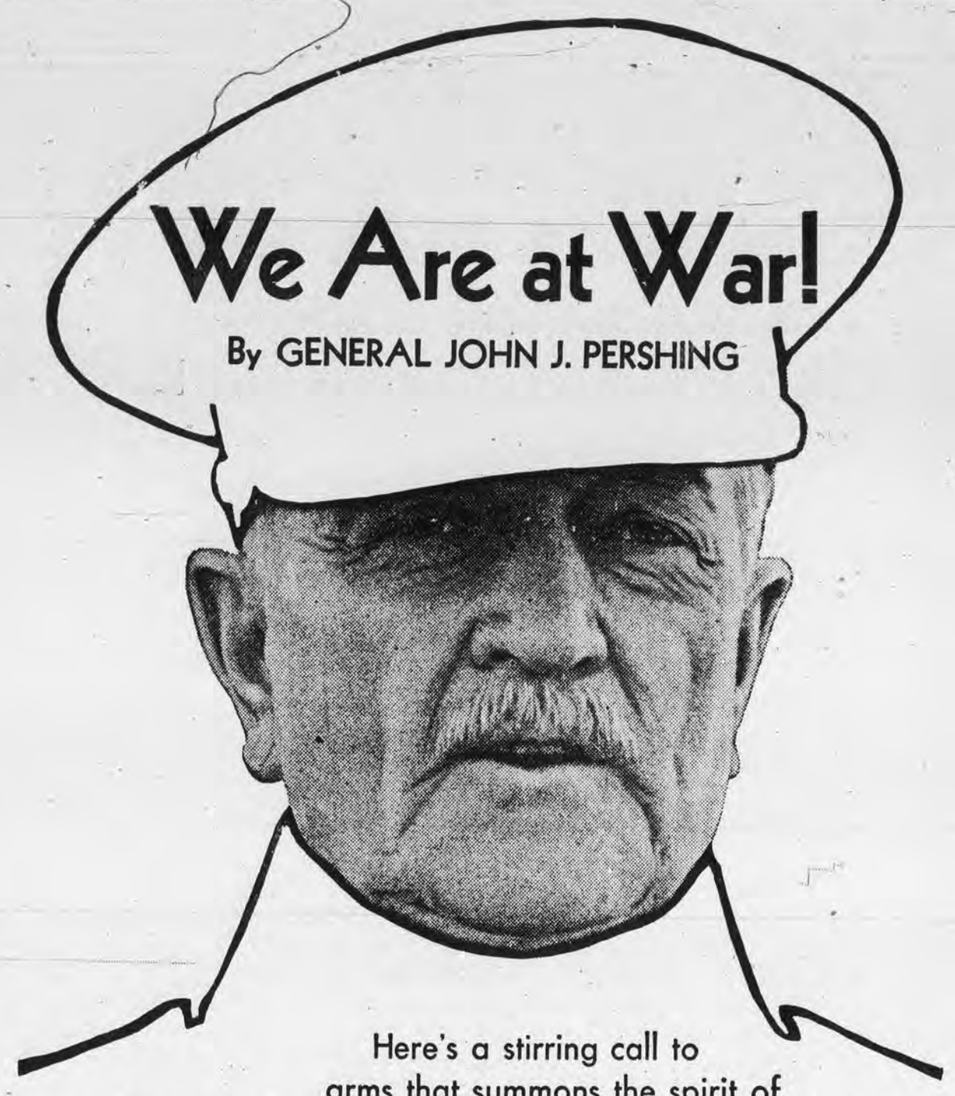
We Are at War!

By GENERAL JOHN J. PERSHING



Here's a stirring call to arms that summons the spirit of those half-forgotten days of resolute marching men

Article I

FOURTEEN years ago an army of two million American citizens was gathering in France. They had left their homes and families and businesses; they had traveled three thousand miles across submarine-infested seas; and now they were ready to lay down their lives, if need be, for their country. Millions more, in America, were prepared to follow them and do likewise.

Today the nation faces another crisis, in which the enemies allied against us are more insidious but not less dangerous. Pervasive self-seeking and corruption, which the chosen officers of the law seem powerless to suppress; the sinister growth of the underworld, whose tentacles reach out to touch us all; the ever-increasing extravagance of government; and the mysterious paralysis of our economic system—these are the enemies which now confront us. They have been allowed to encroach upon us largely through our own carelessness and neglect of duty as citizens.

In the battle against them the average citizen is at a disadvantage because he is unprepared; he is willing enough, but he is bewildered. He doesn't yet realize that he himself is primarily to blame, hence he is taking no serious part in the conflict. By average citizen I mean a great many men to whom we should look for leadership, as well as the larger number who possess no qualifications for it. In fact, too often do citizens of all classes assume that politics, and crime, and even economics, are no business of theirs. It does not occur to them that they are, every one, individually, responsible.

Why is it that patriotism burns so brightly in times of war, so dimly in times of peace? It is just as necessary in meeting the complex obligations of peace, but these obligations do not stir the imagination like the primitive emotions of war. The average citizen feels that, somehow, the problems of peace will be solved for him, and fails to realize the possibility that calamity may result from his own indifference.

Still Can Be Proud.

We have as much reason now as we had fourteen years ago to feel proud of our country and to love it. We believe, with some justice, that it is the greatest republic in the history of the world. Under no flag in the world does a people enjoy more freedom or find greater happiness. We boast of public education, universal suffrage, liberty of speech and the press. We enjoy rights undreamed of in ancient Greece and Rome. Yet even with the sounder principles upon which to base the hope of permanence of our institutions, we too may some day go down, as did these older republics, unless we recognize and live up to our civic obligations. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon every citizen in a democracy that it is his duty to help—actively help—in the task of government.

The other day I was talking to a substantial business man from New York. We were discussing an issue of increased taxation then up before the house of representatives.

"By the way," I said, "who is the representative from your district?"

He grinned sheepishly.

"I don't know," he said.

My friend pays a goodly share of taxes to support the government, and yet he doesn't know who votes for him on the tax question. He relies on "a substitute" and doesn't even know who the substitute is!

This is something of a retrogression from an earlier period. When our government was founded, our forefathers did not let unknowns represent them. They made it their business to know all about the character and achievements of the men they elected to public office. Then the outstanding men in the country took part in politics, and most of the high positions were held by them. Political leaders, then, were chosen by the voters. Now, through the apathy of the voters, they are often chosen by other politicians.

Changing Social Life.

This change is partly due to our changing social life. Many of us do not even know our next-door neighbors. But it is a manifestation of a deeper and more sinister change—the tendency of the average citizen to let somebody else do his thinking for him. That tendency threatens the very foundations of democracy.

"Let some one else do the thinking."

That easy doctrine is injuring us not only in politics but in other fields. Under it crime flourishes and business languishes.

Some international bankers, since the war, have been careless in lending other people's money on foreign securities. Others have been charged with something worse than carelessness. But the citizens who, against sound business principles, put up the money were not without blame. In their eagerness for gain, they too often refused to think for themselves. They preferred to delegate that task to some one else. It was well known to all who read the newspapers that certain governments had already defaulted on debts to their own people. Greedy investors did not balk because of that, but cheerfully put up billions to loan to states, municipalities, and industries of those same governments.

This is not an essay on economics. I am not an economist. I did not foresee the depression, nor do I know when it is going to end, though past experience teaches me the upturn is bound to come, perhaps slowly, perhaps suddenly when we least expect it.

"No matter how sure you are of victory, never fail to make full provision for a reverse."

This rule is axiomatic with every capable military leader, but it was ignored by most of our business leaders during the boom years. Few made plans for anything except triumphant advance from one objective to another. Many burned their bridges behind them. Then the advance was halted and the recession began. It cannot be said that they were to blame for that recession, for apparently our puny human minds have not yet solved the riddle of the business cycle. They were to blame for having made no plans to keep the retreat from turning into a rout. Business might profitably write that military axiom into its books for the years to come.

We have made two other military blunders. We began by underestimating the strength of the enemy, and progressed from that to overestimating it. The cry, "We are just turning the corner," of 1929-30, was the equivalent of "We will have the boys out of the trenches by Christmas" of 1914-15. And our "This country is going to the dogs," of 1932 is the equivalent of "The Central Powers are invincible" of March, 1918. I have heard leading men, given over to fear, prate of nationa' failure, bankruptcy, and Bolshevism. This is no time for craven cringing. Looking out of my window, I see the shaft of the monument to Washington. I think of Valley Forge, and wonder how those who now lament and wring their hands would have enjoyed that winter. This is Washington's bicentennial. It is time for a new reckoning, a new responsibility, a new courage.

During the winter past many a good man, willing and able to work, has gone through a hell of unemployment and uncertainty. Remembering that, we may also find that some good, along with the evil, comes out of all depressions.

I am not a stranger to depressions. Economists tell us that the panic of 1873 was the closest analogy which history furnishes to our present troubles. My father, a well-to-do business man and farmer in Missouri, was caught in that general disaster. I was just thirteen years old. One day my father told me the whole story.

"John," he said, "everything I own has been swept away except the farm, which is covered by a heavy mortgage." (We finally lost it.) "I must try to make some money by traveling as a salesman. While I am away you must take care of the family and manage the farm." During the next three years my brother and I ran the farm. We plowed, sowed, and reaped. We took our produce to market. Those days were not so different from these for the farmer. I remember we had a field of timothy hay which was particularly fine. I baled it up, carload of it, and sent it by rail to St. Louis, hoping to receive a top price, but it did not bring enough to cover the freight charges.

During those years my attendance at school was limited and I had to do the best I could to keep up with my classes by studying at night. Those were certainly hard times. Yet, "sweet are the uses of adversity," and it was the best thing that ever happened to me. It taught me more, gave me greater confidence and a keener sense of responsibility than anything else could have done.

Unsuspected Powers.

I cite my own experience merely to show how men and women actually gain a new strength and courage when thrown upon their own resources and responsibility in times of crisis. They find in themselves powers they never suspected.

The life of a military man furnishes another example valuable in times like the present. In every army career there come occasional times of dullness. The officer, stationed at some remote army post, has his routine duties to perform. When these are completed he finds the temptation almost overwhelming to give over his leisure to cards, light reading, social evenings, painless time-wasting. It is the officer who resists that temptation, who spends hard hours each day studying the latest advances in artillery technic, in transport, in tactics—it is this officer who receives recognition when the opportunity for active service comes.

So it is in business. In this time of extreme dullness, many have sunk back into a kind of lethargy. But the wise business man, like the conscientious officer, is using his present leisure to prepare for the battles to come. He is devising new economies of production and distribution. He is studying the problem of how his product may be varied or made more attractive. He is getting ready to take advantage of the upturn when it comes. He is not accepting gloomy defeatism. He is thinking for himself.

I have touched at some length on the depression because it has so glaringly shown us the folly of carelessly delegating our thinking to others.

It has also thrown a bright cold light on the flaws in our political methods and on our crime problem. During the years of prosperity following the war an underworld of gangsters and racketeers unparalleled in any other civilized nation, grew up and flourished in our cities. The criminals who manned this underworld were of a new type. They were not the masked and shabby plug-uglies who filled the jails in earlier years. They were expensively dressed; they owned machine guns, high-powered cars, and speed boats; they had money in the bank. With this money they were able to establish a relation with corrupt officials and police which seemed to make them immune from prosecution.

Association With Sage Not One-Sided Honor

That's a grand Shaw story. The one relating to his trip to Russia. Strolling along the banks of the Volga, he encountered a beautiful girl playing in the sand.

He stopped to chat with the child, who immediately took a liking to the bearded sage. They walked along the river for a while, her hand in his, Shaw, enjoying the trivialities of which they talked. Finally the little one informed the Shavian body that it was time for her to go home.

"Good-by, my dear," he said, "and when mother asks you where you have been, tell her you have been walking along the Volga with George Bernard Shaw."

The great name was absolutely unknown to the child, but she recognized the courtesy in the words of her strange friend and was not to be outdone. Her pleasant smile and bow acquired a quaint gravity. She replied:

"And when you go home and they ask you where you have been tell them that you were walking along the Volga with Katherina Ivanovna Fyodorovitch."—New York Morning Telegraph.

The Little Big City
Some Are Hopeful
The Farmers Rebel
Science Is No Menace

This is written in the city often called "Little Old New York." This "little city," which happens to be the biggest in the world, is a good seaside resort. You may find hotel rooms, or entire apartments, hundreds of feet above the street, with a cool breeze coming directly from the ocean.

If romantic, you may imagine that it comes straight across from Spain, since Madrid is opposite New York.

This city of wealth and poverty, folly and wisdom, success and misery, is more cheerful in the upper strata than it was a few weeks ago.

The stock market has come to life. Men and women always find money for gambling, even in a depression. Because stocks have gone up, although dividends have not returned, many believe that good times are hurrying back.

Some business men of consequence also believe that signs are cheerful. J. H. Rand of the Remington-Rand company, ordering four and a half millions' worth of raw materials in advance, anticipates a manufacturing increase of 25 per cent in 1933.

P. A. S. Franklin, United States shipping operator, says, as he sails from London, that world conditions are much better because confidence has increased.

Farmers in the Middle West, and farther west, have decided that the way to attract attention is to do something. "Suffering in patient silence does not get you anywhere," is their new idea.

And the plan is, "If the cities will not pay us a decent price we shall not feed the cities."

Farmers patrol highways leading to the cities and turn back loads of farm produce and supplies of milk. In one case a freight train was compelled to stop; its load of live stock was turned loose in the fields.

The "farmers' rebellion"—that is what it amounts to—started vigorously in Iowa and is spreading to other states—Nebraska and Wisconsin.

Iowa farmers got results, among other things an increase of almost 100 per cent in the wholesale price of milk. Even so, you wonder that the farmer can live. His new milk price is only a little more than two dollars a hundred pounds.

If striking, blocking highways, etc., will bring better prices, the example will spread. It is the first important demonstration by farmers, hitherto content with futile speechmaking and routine voting.

Professor Sweeney of Iowa State college tells chemists assembled in Denver that science may turn out to be a Frankenstein monster. "Nations fall when population becomes too crowded in a small area," says the professor. And, says he, feeding and clothing congested population is a problem.

Modern production could feed ten times as many people as there are on earth. The state of Texas, intensively cultivated, would feed the earth's population, clothe and house them, and that entire population, by the way, could stand at one time on Staten island in New York harbor.

In Milwaukee, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Ceretto's baby was born "dead," no sign of life, no breathing. They called the police and they called, not a doctor, but the fire department. It sent its rescue squad, and for three hours big firemen worked over the tiny baby until its face turned gradually from dark blue to pink. Then they took it to the hospital. That would have been considered a first-class miracle 500 years ago.

What we see impresses us; what we do not see makes little impression. Show a man one child drowning and he will jump in, risking his life if necessary. Tell him that thousands are suffering in the slums, or far away in China, and he will say, "That's too bad."

Ten thousand centuries ago men learned to control fire, to warm themselves and cook their food. They worshiped fire, incorporated it in their religions. It plays a part in some of them today.

Now men learn to cool themselves with electricity as they warmed themselves a million years ago with burning logs.

It would surprise our savage ancestors of the caves, that shuddered when they saw the lightning, to know that their descendants use the lightning now to cool a dining car and keep meat from decaying.

The League of Nations will have a chance to show what it amounts to, in connection with the Manchurian question. The league said to Japan, "You must not take Manchuria." Japan now replies, officially, through her minister of war: "Kindly mind your own business. The Manchurians themselves set up their independent government. We merely recognize that government, as you have recognized all sorts of queer European governments and thefts of colonies since the big war."

It had been five years since Sabra had heard news of her husband, Yancey Cravat. And now, for the first time, she felt that he was dead, though she had never admitted this. In spite of his years she had heard that Yancey had gone to France during the war. The American and the English armies had rejected him, so he had dyed his graying hair, lied about his age, thrown back his still magnificent shoulders, and somehow, by his eyes, his voice, his hands, or a combination of all these, had hypnotized them into taking him. An unofficial report had listed him among the missing after the carnage had ceased in the shambles that had been a wooded plateau called the Argonne.

"He isn't dead," Sabra had said, almost calmly. "When Yancey Cravat dies he'll be on the front page, and the world will know it."

But a year had gone by.

The Oklahoma Wigwam now issued a morning as well as an afternoon edition and was known as the most powerful newspaper in the Southwest. When Sabra was in town she made a practice of driving down to the office at eleven every night, remaining there for an hour looking over the layout, reading the wet galley proof of the night's news lead, scanning the A. P. wires. Her entrance was in the nature of the passage of royalty, and when she came into the city room the staff all but saluted. True, she wasn't there very much, except in the summer, when congress was not in session.

The sight of a woman on the floor of the congressional house was still something of a novelty. Sentimental America had shrunk from the thought of women in active politics. Woman's place was in the home, and American womanhood was too exquisite a flower to be subjected to the harsh atmosphere of the assembly floor and the committee room.

Sabra stumped the state and developed a surprising gift of oratory.

Perhaps it was not altogether what she said that counted in her favor. Her appearance must have had something to do with it. A slim, straight, dignified woman, yet touchingly feminine. Her voice not loud, but clear. Her white hair was shingled and beautifully waved and beneath this her soft dark eyes took on an added depth and brilliance. Her eyebrows had remained black and thick, still further enhancing her finest feature. Her dress was always dark, becoming, smart, and her silken ankles above the slim slippers with their cut-steel buckles were those of a young girl. The aristocratic Marcy feet and ankles.

In Washington she was quite a belle among the old boys in congress and even the senate. The opposition party tried to blackmail her with publicity about certain unproved items in the life of her dead (or missing) husband Yancey Cravat: a two-gun man, a desperado, a killer, a drunkard, a squaw man. Then they started on young Cim and his Osage Indian wife, but Sabra and Donna were too quick for them.

Donna Wyatt leased a handsome house in Dupont circle, staffed it, brought Tracy Wyatt's vast wealth and influence to bear, and planned a coup so brilliant that it routed the enemy forever. She brought her handsome, sleepy-eyed brother Cim and his wife Ruby Big Elk, and the youngsters Felice and Yancey to the house in Dupont circle, and together she and Sabra gave a reception for them to which they invited a group so precious that it actually came.

Sabra and Donna, exquisitely dressed, stood in line at the head of the magnificent room, and between them stood Ruby Big Elk in her dress of creamy white doeskin all embroidered in beads from shoulder to hem. She was an imposing figure, massive but not offensively fat as were many of the older Osage women, and her black abundant hair had taken on a mist of gray.

"My daughter-in-law, Mrs. Cimarron Cravat, of the Osage Indian tribe."

"My son's wife, Ruby Big Elk—Mrs. Cimarron Cravat."

"My sister-in-law, Mrs. Cimarron Cravat. A full-blood Osage Indian. . . . Yes, indeed. We think so, too."

And, "How do you do?" said Ruby, in her calm, insolent way.

For the benefit of those who had not quite been able to encompass the Indian woman in her native dress Ruby's next public appearance was made in a Paris gown of white. She became the rage, was considered picturesque, and left Washington in disgust, her work done. No one but her husband, whom she loved with a doglike devotion, could have induced her to go through this ceremony.

The opposition retired, vanquished.

Donna and Tracy Wyatt then hired a special train in which they took fifty eastern potentates on a tour of Oklahoma. One vague and not very bright Washington matron, of great social prestige, impressed with what she saw, voiced her opinion to young Yancey Cravat, quite confused as to his identity and seeing only an attractive and very handsome young male seated beside her at a country club luncheon.

"I had no idea Oklahoma was like this. I thought it was all oil and dirty Indians."

"There is quite a lot of oil, but we're not all dirty."

"We?"

"I'm an Indian."

Osage, Okla., was now just as much like New York as Osage could manage to make it. They built twenty-story office buildings in a city that had hundreds of miles of prairie to spread in. Tracy Wyatt built the first skyscraper—the Wyatt building. It was pointed out and advertised all over the flat prairie state. Then Pat Leary, dancing an Irish jig of jealousy, built the Leary building, twenty-three stories high. But the sweet fruits of triumph soon turned to ashes in his mouth. The Wyatt building's foundations were not built to stand the added strain of five full stories. So he had built a five-story tower, slim and tapering, a taunting finger pointing to the sky. Again Tracy Wyatt owned the tallest building in Oklahoma.

On the roof of the Levy Mercantile company's building Sol had had built a penthouse after his own plans. It was the only one of its kind in all Oklahoma. That small part of Osage which did not make an annual pilgrimage to New York was slightly bewildered by Sol Levy's roof life. They fed one another with scraps of gossip got from servants, clerks, stenographers who claimed to have seen the place at one time or another. It was, these said, filled with the rarest of carpets, rugs, books, hangings. Super radio, super phonograph, super player piano. Music hungry. There he lived, alone, in luxury, of the town, yet no part of it.

Money was now the only standard. If Pat Leary had sixty-two million dollars on Tuesday he was Oklahoma's leading citizen. If Tracy Wyatt had seventy-eight million dollars on Wednesday then Tracy Wyatt was Oklahoma's leading citizen.

Sabra probably was the only woman of her own generation and social position in Osage who still wore on the third finger of her left hand the plain broad gold band of a long-past day. Synchronous with the permanent wave and the reducing diet the oil-rich Osage matrons of Sabra's age cast sentiment aside for fashion, quietly placed the clumsy band in a bureau drawer and appeared with a slim platinum circlet bearing, perhaps, the engraved anachronism, "M. G.-K. L. 1884." Certainly it was much more at ease among its square-cut emerald and oblong-diamond neighbors. These ladies explained (if at all) that the gold band had grown too tight for the finger, or too loose. Sabra looked down at the broad old-fashioned wedding ring on her own gemless finger. She had not once taken it off in over forty years. It was as much a part of her as the finger itself.

All the Oklahoma millionaire houses had libraries. Yards and yards of fine leather libraries, with gold tooling. Ike Hawkes' library had five sets of Dickens alone, handsomely bound in red, green, blue, brown, and black, and Ike all unaware of any of them.

Moving picture palaces, with white-gloved ushers, had all the big Broadway super-films. Gas filling stations on every corner. Hot dog, chili con carne, and hamburger stands on the most remote country roads. The Arverne Grand Opera company at the McKee theater for a whole week every year, and the best of everything—Traviata, Boheme, Carmen, Louise, The Barber of Seville. The display of jewels during that week made the diamond horseshoe at the Metropolitan look like the Black Hole of Calcutta.

The sunbonnets had triumphed.

Still, oil was oil, and Indians were Indians. There was no way in which either of these native forces could quite be molded to fit the New York pattern.

The Osages still whirled up and down the Oklahoma roads, and those roads, for hundreds of miles, were still unpaved red prairie dust. They crashed into ditches and draws and culverts as of old, walked back to town and, entering the automobile salesroom in which they had bought the original car, pointed with one dusky finger at a new and glittering model.

"'Nother," they said, succinctly. And drove out with it.

It was common news that Charley Vest had smashed eight cars in a year, but then Charley had a mysterious source through which he procured fire water.

Sabra Cravat had introduced a bill for the further protection of the Osages, and rather took away the breath of the house assembled by advocating abolition of the Indian reservation system. Her speech, radical though it was, and sensational, was greeted with favor by some of the more liberal of the congressmen. They even conceded that this idea of hers, to the effect that the Indian would never develop or express himself until he was as free as the negro, might some day become a reality. These were the reformers—the long-hairs—fanatics.

Oklahoma was very proud of Sabra Cravat, editor, congresswoman, pioneer. Osage said she embodied the finest spirit of the state and of the Southwest. When ten of Osage's most unctuous millionaires contributed fifty thousand dollars each for a five-hundred-thousand-dollar statue that should embody the Oklahoma pioneer no one was surprised to hear that the sculptor, Masja Krbecek, wanted to interview Sabra Cravat.

Osage was not familiar with the sculpture of Krbecek, but it was impressed with the price of it. Half a million dollars for a statue!

"Certainly," said the committee, calmly. "He's the best there is. Half a million is nothing for his stuff. He wouldn't kick a pebble for less than a quarter of a million."

"Do you suppose he'll do her as a pioneer woman in a sunbonnet? Holding little Cim by the hand, huh? Or maybe in a covered wagon."

Sabra received Krbecek in a simple (draped) dress. He turned out to be a quiet, rather snuffy little Pole in eyeglasses, who looked more like a tailor—a "little" tailor—than a sculptor. His eye roamed about the living room of the house on Kihekik. The old wooden house had been covered with plaster in a deep warm shade much the color of the native clay; the gimcrack porch and the cupolas had been torn away and a great square veranda and a terrace built at the side, away from the street and screened by a thick hedge and an iron grille. It was now, in fact, much the house that Yancey had planned when Sabra first built it years ago. The old pieces of mahogany and glass and silver were back, triumphant again over the plush and brocade with which Sabra had furnished the house when new. The old, despised since pioneer days, was again the fashion in Osage. There was the DeGrasse silver; the cake dish with the carefree cupids, the mantelpiece figures of china.

"You are very comfortable here in Oklahoma," said Masja Krbecek. He pronounced it syllable by syllable, painfully. O-kla-ho-ma.

"It is a very simple home," Sabra replied, "compared to the other places you have seen hereabouts."

"It is the home of a good woman," said Krbecek, dryly.

Sabra was a trifle startled, but she said thank you, primly.

"You are a congress member, you are editor of a great newspaper, you are well known throughout the country. You American women, you are really amazing."

Again Sabra thanked him.

"Tell me, will you, my dear lady," he went on, "some of the many interesting things about your life and that of your husband, this Yancey Cravat who so far preceded his time."

So Sabra told him. Somehow, as she talked, the years rolled back, curtain after curtain, into the past. The Run. Then they were crossing the prairie, there was the first glimpse of the mud wallow that was Osage, the church meeting in the tent, the Pegler murder, the outlaws, the early years of the paper, the Indians, oil. She talked very well in her clear, decisive voice. At his request she showed him the time-yellowed photographs of Yancey, of herself. Krbecek listened. At the end, "It is touching," he said. "It makes me weep." Then he kissed her hand and went away, taking one or two of the old photographs with him.

The statue of the Spirit of the Oklahoma Pioneer was unveiled a year later, with terrific ceremonies. It was a heroic figure of Yancey Cravat stepping forward with that light graceful stride in the high-heeled Texas star boots, the skirts of the Prince Albert billowing behind with the vigor of his movements, the sombrero atop the great menacing buffalo head, one beautiful hand resting lightly on the weapon in his two-gun holster. Behind him, one hand just touching his shoulder for support, stumbled the weary, blanketed figure of an Indian.

Prolific Author

Horatio Alger was a graduate of Harvard, and also of Harvard Divinity school. He became a pastor of the Unitarian church at Brewster, Mass., in 1864; but two years later he went to New York, where he labored for the improvement of the condition of street boys. He wrote much for newspapers and periodicals and published about 70 books, of which nearly 800,000 copies have been sold.

First "Labor Party"

In 1828 a group of Philadelphia artisans organized the Workingmen's party. The platform of the pioneer labor party of modern times had nothing to do with wages, everything with status: Free public education, mechanical lien laws to protect wage earners from rascally contractors, and the abolition of imprisonment for debt.

Fitted Only for Depths

Deep-water animals are so constructed that the water is able to penetrate their bodies. Crabs which live on the sea bottom are full of water, so that the pressure inside is practically the same as that outside. Thus when such sea-bottom creatures are brought to the surface they explode.

OLD BELIEF THAT FIRE BRINGS RAIN

Actual Experiences Seem to Uphold Theory.

Not only by magical incantations has man attempted to force the skies to conform with his wishes. Men of practical habits of thought and free from superstition have come forward with rain-making schemes, backed by strange examples of their reported efficacy. Patents have been granted for rain-making systems, and there have been two congressional appropriations for investigating the artificial making of rain. There is a widespread belief that a large fire will bring rain, still held by old residents of the West. Dobrizhoffer, a missionary, in a book printed in 1784 telling of his work in South America, stated that the Indians produced rain by setting fire to the plains, and James P. Espy, an American meteorologist, quotes the remarkable story of a surveyor who with his crew was running township lines in Florida in 1845.

Acres of tall grass, imbedded in the dead grass accumulation of years, impeded their progress. They marked out an area to prevent the flames from reaching the forest, and set fire to it.

"In a very few minutes," he wrote, "an awful blaze swept over the entire surface which we had marked out for our purpose. We then crossed our line. Ere we had proceeded over 40 chains a delightful breeze sprang up and cooled the atmosphere, and presently a refreshing shower sparkled in the bright rays of the sun."

This attracted no attention at the time, and the work went on. The breeze disappeared and the intense heat returned, much to the discomfort of the negroes whose duty it was to cut lines and mark trees. Meanwhile, the assistant foreman, who had heard of the theory that fires would bring rain, recalled that during the fire he had seen a dark cloud form at the apex of the column of smoke, and suggested that it would be a good time to put the matter to the test. They had reached another grass jungle, and he told the complaining negroes that if they worked well he would reward them with a shower to refresh them. They looked at the cloudless sky and laughed, whereupon he pretended to be indignant at their unbelief.

The grass was set on fire, and the explorer, to heighten the mystery, drew a magic circle and knelt in it, muttering cabalistic phrases of broken French. Some whites, who were in on the secret, fell upon their knees around the surveyor made signs and drew outlines of devils on the earth. At once there was a peal of distant thunder. The lightning flashed, the sky darkened, and the rain came down in torrents, and the negroes fell upon the ground with awe in their faces. The rain came from a single cloud, and the clear sky could be seen all about it.

"We often fired the sawgrass marshes afterward," the surveyor concluded, "and wherever there was no wind stirring, we were sure to get a shower; and I say with perfect confidence that we never had a shower in April or May at any other time."

His Poetry Popular

A sixteen-year-old shoemaker-poet has recovered his job at Frosinone, Italy, with liberty to write verse on the inside of women's footwear. The boy had been discharged when his employers learned that women's shoes were going to the market with bits of sentimental poetry inscribed on the inner leather. Customers convinced the employers that the poetry was making the footgear more popular.

25 YEARS AGO IN COLUMBIANA

There is talk of electric light and waterworks for Columbiana. The Sentinel trusts the projects will materialize, for it is needed, very very much in our town.

Prof. Spright Dowell has been invited to give the Commencement address to the Columbiana Graded Schools and has accepted the invitation. Prof. Dowell has many friends in Columbiana, he having been at the head of the schools here for a number of years and all will be glad to not only see him but to hear him on matters of education, a work in which he is deeply interested.

RAMBLING REMARKS
By
The Rambler

Recently we learned the definition of a bigoted man. He is one who not only doesn't agree with you, but isn't even willing to argue about it.

Are you ready for prosperity. It is coming and isn't going to be long about it and its coming isn't due to the Republicans efforts but in spite of them to prevent it.

The present legislature now in session has the opportunity to make fame for the body thru the years to follow. The state is in a condition where the services of real statesmen instead of penny politicians are needed. There is no need in being a bit stubborn about the matter. If an issue cannot be agree on then come to some agreement that will enable the state to pay the debts, especially the money due to school teachers, and be able to regain favor in the eyes of the people. Taxes should not be increased on the little man who does not have enough income to pay the taxes as they are now. The people with stocks and bonds in the banks without property and not paying their share of the running expenses of the state should be made pay.

Several communities will soon feel that prosperity has returned when the bids are opened and the contracts let for the new paved highways in Alabama. The first of these will be let on September 6th and no doubt the contractors will start work at once. At least they must within 15 days. A payroll of any kind will be a blessing in this day and time. The wages will be low but that will be due to the fact the number of working hours a week will be limited so as to place as many men as possible at work. The people ought not to talk about low wages and such things as long as the hours are few and as long as some man is getting an income that he isn't at present.

Some of the crews working on the highways at the present time are letting up on their work. We have traveled over a number of Alabama roads recently and some of those built just a few years ago are getting in mighty bad shape whereas a litlte work all along will keep them in shape.

In this day and time there is no need for a girl remaining single if she has a pretty face, shapely figure, and a good job.

During this hot weather a stroll down the street would convince Barnum that a seersucker must have been born every minute.

CALERA CAFE CELEBRATES FIRST ANNIVERSARY

Among the business institutions that deserve award in Shelby County is the Calera Cafe in Calera.

August closes an entire year that the Calera Cafe has been open twenty four hours every day and not even once has the door been closed to the public, giving at all hours prompt and courteous service.

Calera appreciates the effort put forth in maintaining the high standard of service by the management of this concern.

You, no doubt, have noticed the advertisements, in the recent editions of this paper offering to their patrons the very best of foods and tasty sandwiches. They now offer quick and safe taxi service. This also is a 24 hour service.

The Proprietor and Manager, Clayton Wallace believes in the slogan that "work and the economic beliefs in the future of the country" will defeat the depression, and in putting this slogan into practice has evidently been successful in the past year, but is expecting even a better record at the end of another year. He expressed his sincere thanks to his many patrons and especially to those in Calera, Columbiana and Montevallo in helping him attain this joyous and successful anniversary.

MILLER-BELL WEDDING OF INTEREST TO MANY FRIENDS OVER STATE

Former Football Star And Bride To Reside In Tennessee After Carolina Trip

Of cordial interest to her many friends in Shelby County was the wedding of Miss Florine Bell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Bell of Vincent, and John Alexander Miller, which was impressively solemnized on Thursday evening at 6:30 o'clock at the Methodist Church in Vincent.

Before an improvised altar of white lattice work festooned with clematis and bordered with mid summer flowers, Rev. Rudolph Scott, of Sulligent, Alabama, read the nuptial vows, using the ring ceremony. Cathedral tapers burning in branched candelabra cast a soft glow on the trellised arch before which the bridal couple repeated their vows.

A beautiful program of nuptial music preceeded the ceremony presented by Mrs. Jabe McGraw and Mrs. R. T. McGraw of Vincent. The attendants included Miss Elizabeth Bell, only sister of the bride, maid of honor; Miss Dorothy Summer, Leeds, Miss Doris Holeman, Hartford; Miss Odie Joe Jernigan, Monroeville; Miss Billie Arthur, Vincent, Miss Gladys Whigham, Montgomery, bridesmaids. The attractive group wore rainbow colored evening gowns of net over crepe, and modeled on princess lines. They carried French bouquets of pastel tinted flowers.

Charles (Foots) Clements, of Memphis, attended Mr. Miller as best man and the groomsmen were: Harold High, Bessemer; M. C. Scales, Tuscaloosa; Newton Godfrey, Alexander City; Frank Howard, Clemson, S. C.; Albert Elmore, Troy, Alabama; Paul Jones, Cordova, Alabama; James Gorman and Richard Carter, of Vincent, Alabama acted as ushers.

The bride who was given in marriage by her father, was lovely in her bridal gown of white pebble satin. She wore a veil of net edged with lace and sprayed with orange blossoms.

White rosebuds and lillies of the valley formed the bridal bouquet.

Immediately after the ceremony, Mr. and Mrs. Bell entertained the bridal party and the out of town guests, at a wedding supper. The bride's table, spread with lace, was centered with a tiered, embossed, wedding cake topped with a miniature bride and groom, presided over by Miss Marie Painter, of Albertville, Alabama. Tall tapers tied with yellow tulle, in silver holders, were arranged on the four corners of the tables.

Misses Carolyn Perkins, of Columbus, Ga., and Mae Parker, of Birmingham, Ala., presided at the punch bowl.

Mrs. Tom Jennings of Birmingham, kept the bride's book.

Mr. and Mrs. Miller are spending a few weeks in North Carolina on their wedding trip and after their return will be at home at 669 University Place, Memphis, Tenn., where Mr. Miller is connected with the faculty of Southwestern University.

wets and honest drys. Democrats, Republicans, Inderpendents, were disgusted. They threw the ticket into the discard."

This year, he added "the Republican national leaders have tried the same circus stunt. The answer of the voters throughout the nation will be precisely the same."

The present Republican leadership Roosevelt asserted, "stands convicted of trying to evade and confuse the issue. The honest dry will honor more the honest wet than the shifty dry, and the anti-prohibitionist prefers the four square dry to the uncertain wet", he said.

All will join in condemning a fearful and timid practice of evasion."

The Democratic presidential aspirant declared Mr. Hoover's acceptance speech "proceeds deliberately to misrepresent the position of the Democratic party." He says "our opponents pledge the members of their party to destroy every vestige of constitutional and effective federal control of the (liquor) traffic."

DIRECT CAMPAIGNING GIVES PRESIDENTIAL ISSUES DEFINITENESS

other Democratic highlight in denying Mayor Walker's plea to inject the question of partisan political motives into the hearing before him or the fitness of Walker to retain his office.

Beyond this, the week witnessed the start of a mobilization by both parties of shock troop campaign orators. These included feminine political notables like former Governor Nellie Tayloe Ross of Wyoming, Democrat, and Mrs. Dolly Cann, sister and the official hostess of Vice President Curtis, Republican, for the Maine State Campaign that some party leaders always regard as a political barometer in presidential election years.

In Washington, it saw President Hoover's latest conference with the Industrial and commercial leaders from the twelve Federal Reserve Districts assembled in Washington to receive suggestions for a new attack on the forces of depression.

And in New York State it saw the name of former Governor Alfred E. Smith appear among those of delegates to the Democratic State Convention in October despite his present aloofness from politics and newly assumed editorial duties. His continued silence left purely conjectural the question of whether the expected mutual efforts of Gov. Roosevelt and the former Governor to secure nomination of Lieut. Lehman as Roosevelt's successor at Albany would be followed by Smith's support of the Roosevelt-Garner-National ticket.

In the meantime, Gov. General Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., announced from Manilla his approaching his return home to participate in the campaign in President Hoover's behalf and against his distant cousin, the Democratic nominee.

Sec. Hurley indicated that Col. Roosevelt had not been summoned home officially for the good his name and presence might be in offsetting the lure of the Roosevelt name to voters. Rep. John Tilson of Connecticut, in charge of the Republican National Speaker's Bureau, however, indicated that young Roosevelt's participation was a part of general campaign strategy plans.

Gov. Roosevelt's campaign plans were hampered by the length by which the Walker hearings at Albany were running. He had two early speaking engagements, in New Jersey and Connecticut, however, which were awaited as indicating further the line of attack on the Hoover Administration's Economic theories the Democratic candidate will follow in his wide swing in September about the national campaign circuit.

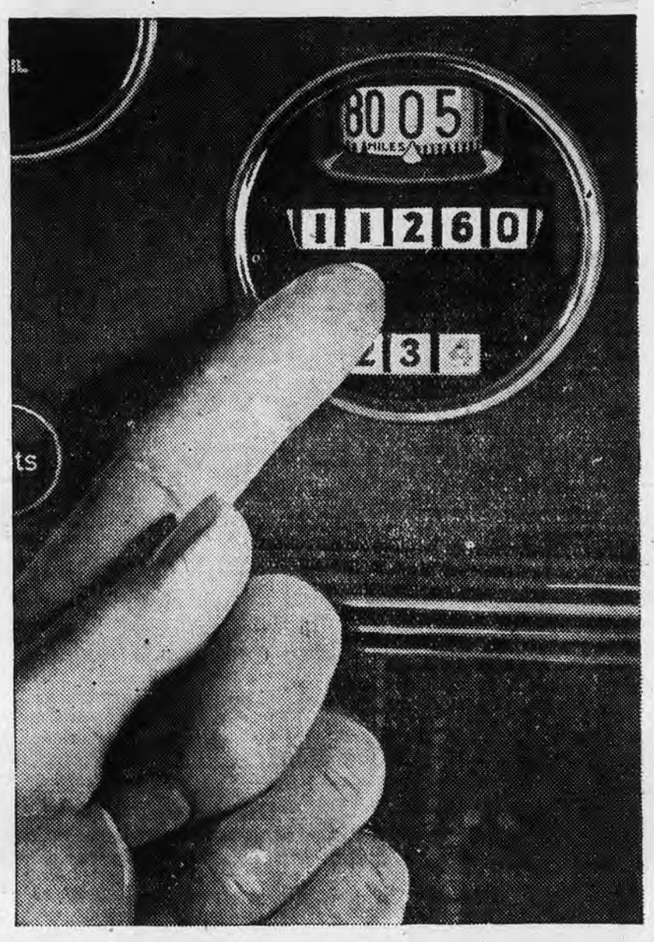
part of the County, has been a vital factor in relieving the suffering of many families in the territory. Browsing thru the Courthouse one day last week, the writer was amazed at the crowd surrounding Miss Kimbrough's desk—the efficient way in which each case was courteously and considerately disposed of. Her kindness and tact with the most unfortunate ones even when she was powerless to give the aid desired, left one with the desire at least to make known a few of the worth while cases to you, believing you will gladly "share" the load Old Man Depression has for so long held over many of our citizens right here in our midst—for instance:

1. There are two little boys in Shelby County, who have been attending the School for the Blind, and they cannot continue their education unless they have proper clothes. Will some one give these boys clothes so they can continue their school work?

2. A little girl 8 years old, whose mother was deserted by her father needs some dresses.

3. A mother has offered to make shirts for boys, if someone will furnish the cloth.

4. Two little homeless girls are in need of clothes, ages 4 and 6.



ESPECIALLY AFTER 10,000 MILES

you'll be glad you said

"Six Cylinders—No more . . No less"

Just compare a Chevrolet Six whose speedometer reads more than 10,000 miles with any other low-priced car of about the same mileage. Compare bodies. Compare chassis. Compare the way the two cars have stood up. Compare the gas and oil mileage each is getting. You'll be surprised at what a difference there is in favor of Chevrolet.

The reason for this difference after 10,000 miles can be summed up in three major facts: First, Chevrolet is such a wonderfully well-built car. Second, Chevrolet has adequate weight, unusual ruggedness and strength to withstand the effects of long, hard usage. Third, the Chevrolet engine has SIX CYLINDERS. And SIX is the fewest number of cylinders you can have in a car, and avoid destructive vibration.

Play safe, in choosing that low-priced car of yours. Put your good money in a sure thing. Buy the automobile in which the majority of American motor car buyers have placed their faith ever since January, 1931—a new Chevrolet Six.
